CSL PUNCTUATION OF ENGLISH

The acute accent on Sanskrit words when they occur outside of the Sanskrit text itself, marks stress, e.g. Ramáyana. It is not part of traditional Sanskrit orthography, transliteration or transcription, but we supply it here to guide readers in the pronunciation of these unfamiliar words. Since no Sanskrit word is accented on the last syllable it is not necessary to accent disyllables, e.g. Rama.

The second CSL innovation designed to assist the reader in the pronunciation of lengthy unfamiliar words is to insert an unobtrusive middle dot between semantic word breaks in compound names (provided the word break does not fall on a vowel resulting from the fusion of two vowels), e.g. Maha-bhárata, but Ramáyana (not Rama-áyana). Our dot echoes the punctuating middle dot (·) found in the oldest surviving samples of written Sanskrit, the Ashokan inscriptions of the third century BCE.

The deep layering of Sanskrit narrative has also dictated that we use quotation marks only to announce the beginning and end of every direct speech, and not at the beginning of every paragraph.

CSL PUNCTUATION OF SANSKRIT

The Sanskrit text is also punctuated, in accordance with the punctuation of the English translation. In mid-verse, the punctuation will not alter the sandhi or the scansion. Proper names are capitalized, as are the initial words of verses (or paragraphs in prose texts). Most Sanskrit metres have four “feet” (pāda): where possible we print the common śloka metre on two lines. The capitalization of verse beginnings makes it easy for the reader to recognize longer metres where it is necessary to print the four metrical feet over four or eight lines. In the Sanskrit text, we use French Guillemets (e.g. «kva saṃcīrṣuḥ?») instead of English quotation marks (e.g. “Where are you off to?”) to avoid confusion with the apostrophes used for vowel elision in sandhi.

Sanskrit presents the learner with a challenge: sandhi (“euphonic combination”). Sandhi means that when two words are joined in connected speech or writing (which in Sanskrit reflects speech), the last letter (or even letters) of the first word often changes; compare the way we pronounce “the” in “the beginning” and “the end.”

In Sanskrit the first letter of the second word may also change; and if both the last letter of the first word and the first letter of the second are vowels, they may fuse. This has a parallel in English: a nasal consonant is inserted between two vowels that would otherwise coalesce: “a pear” and “an apple.” Sanskrit vowel fusion may produce ambiguity. The chart at the back of each book gives the full sandhi system.

Fortunately it is not necessary to know these changes in order to start reading Sanskrit. For that, what is important is to know the form of the second word without sandhi (pre-sandhi), so that it can be recognized or looked up in a dictionary. Therefore we are printing Sanskrit with a system of punctuation that will indicate, unambiguously, the original form of the second word, i.e., the form without sandhi. Such sandhi mostly concerns the fusion of two vowels.

In Sanskrit, vowels may be short or long and are written differently accordingly. We follow the general convention that a vowel with no mark above it is short. Other books mark a long vowel either with a bar called a macron (ā) or with a circumflex (â). Our system uses the macron, except that for initial vowels in sandhi we use a circumflex to indicate that originally the vowel was short, or the shorter of two possibilities (e rather than ai, o rather than au).

When we print initial â, before sandhi that vowel was a

î or ê ,	i
û or ô ,	u

âi,	e
âu,	o
ā,	ā (i.e., the same)
ī,	ī (i.e., the same)
ū,	ū (i.e., the same)
ē,	ī
ō,	ū
āi,	ai
āu,	au
', before sandhi there was a vowel a

FURTHER HELP WITH VOWEL SANDHI

When a final short vowel (a, i or u) has merged into a following vowel, we print ' at the end of the word, and when a final long vowel (ā, ī or ū) has merged into a following vowel we print " at the end of the word. The vast majority of these cases will concern a final a or ā.

Examples:

What before sandhi was atra asti is represented as atr' âsti

atra âste	atr' âste
kanyā asti	kany" âsti
kanyā âste	kany" âste
atra iti	atr' êti
kanyā iti	kany" êti
kanyā īpsitā	kany" ēpsitā

Finally, three other points concerning the initial letter of the second word:

(1) A word that before sandhi begins with ṛ (vowel), after sandhi begins with r followed by a consonant: yathā" rtu represents pre-sandhi yathā rtu.

(2) When before sandhi the previous word ends in t and the following word begins with ś, after sandhi the last letter of the previous word is c and the following word begins with ch: syāc chāstravit represents pre-sandhi syāt śāstravit.

CSL CONVENTIONS

(3) Where a word begins with h and the previous word ends with a double consonant, this is our simplified spelling to show the pre-sandhi form: tad hasati is commonly written as tad dhasati, but we write tadd hasati so that the original initial letter is obvious.

COMPOUNDS

We also punctuate the division of compounds (samāsa), simply by inserting a thin vertical line between words. There are words where the decision whether to regard them as compounds is arbitrary. Our principle has been to try to guide readers to the correct dictionary entries.

EXAMPLE

Where the Deva-nāgarī script reads:

कुम्भस्थली रक्षतु वो विकीर्णसिन्दूररेणुद्विरदानस्य।
प्रशान्तये विघ्नतमाश्चातानां निष्ठ्यूतबालातपपल्लवेव॥

Others would print:

kumbhasthalī rakṣatu vo vikīrṇasindūrareṇur dviradānanasya / praśāntaye vighnatamaśchaṭānām niṣṭhyūtabālātapapallaveva //

We print:

Kumbha|sthalī rakṣatu vo vikīrṇa|sindūra|reṇur dvirad'|ānanasya
praśāntaye vighna|tamaś|chaṭānām niṣṭhyūta|bāl'|āta|pallav" ēva.

And in English:

“May Ganésha’s domed forehead protect you! Streaked with vermilion dust, it seems to be emitting the spreading rays of the rising sun to pacify the teeming darkness of obstructions.”

“Nava-sāhasanka and the Serpent Princess” I.3 by Padma-gupta

INTRODUCTION

Theirs are exploits the world will keep alive in memory forever. “Ayódhya” 54.18

ALTHOUGH ONE CAN no longer claim with the confidence of previous scholars that in its “original” form the “Ramáyana” began with “Ayódhya” (the Ayodhyā/kāṇḍa), nonetheless, the main narrative of the poem commences in this book. The name of Ayódhya, the capital city of the ancient state of Kósala in east-central India, is an apposite choice for title. For in contrast to the other four central books of the epic, where the action takes place in the unpeopled wilderness, the land of the monkeys, and the island fortress of the demons (rākṣasa), here the center of interest is the city, where social life reaches its greatest degree of complexity and intensity.

It was probably not much earlier than the seventh century BCE that the major urban centers of aryan India came into existence, and yet during the composition of the “Ramáyana” in pre-Mauryan times the city had already become the literary focal point of civilized life. The epic poets were primarily concerned with life as played out in the city. Their interest embraced both social life—especially the family with its inherent tensions, the responsibilities it imposes on the individual, and often the conflicting allegiances it exacts—and political life, the “state,” and the powers of the state, which appeared in their most tangible manifestations in the city. Moreover, as we shall see in “The Forest” (“Ramáyana” Book Three, the Aranya/kāṇḍa), they regarded the “desolate forest” as a zone of mystery, where supernatural forces came into play, yet where a certain Edenic quality had been preserved.

The contrast—at times tension—between the city and the forest, which was increasingly to command the attention of the urban poet, becomes palpable, perhaps for the first time in Indian history, here in “Ayódhya.” It is with an unmistakable sense of liberation that Rama will find himself banished from Ayódhya and its troubles. This attitude seems to be symptomatic of a new urban malaise. But this opposition remains secondary in the present book. For the most part, Valmíki directs our attention to the city and its central concerns. And if in the subsequent books the scene shifts beyond the human social order and the issues raised here become attenuated, they remain the fundamental ones for Valmíki.

If Homer, for example, addresses a transcendent problem, showing us what makes life finally impossible, Valmíki poses the more difficult question: What is it that makes life possible? This is more difficult because it is a social, not a cosmic question. And the answer raises additional questions: it is behavior in accordance with dharma, “righteousness,” that alone makes life possible. But what exactly does “righteousness” mean? What are the kinds and limits of the obligations it imposes? Who is placed under these obligations, and to whom and how are they to be discharged?

BRIEF SYNOPSIS

While Bhárata, the king's second eldest son, is away in the land of Kékaya, King Dasha-ratha decides to consecrate his eldest son Rama as prince regent. Bhárata's mother, Kaikéyi, learns of the news from her hunchback servant, Mánthara, who persuades her that the coronation poses a serious threat to her son. By means of two boons which Dasha-ratha had granted her long ago, Kaikéyi forces the king to agree to her own son's succession and Rama's banishment to the wilderness for fourteen years.

When Kaikéyi tells Rama of these demands, he agrees unhesitatingly, assuring her that he will depart the same day. Kausálya and Lákshmana, Rama's mother and youngest brother respectively, attempt to dissuade Rama from obeying Kaikéyi, but he stands firm in his resolve.

Rama is persuaded by his wife, Sita, to take her along to the forest, and he also grants Lákshmana permission to accompany him into exile.

Dressing in the barkcloth garments of an ascetic, Rama takes leave of his parents and sets out amid the lamentation of the inhabitants of the city. Crossing the river Ganges, he establishes his hermitage on Mount Chitra-kuta.

Meanwhile, from the depths of his misery in Ayódhya, Dasha-ratha recovers the memory of something that had happened in his youth. He had accidentally killed a young ascetic, and the boy's father, a sage, had laid a curse on him that he too would end his days in grief for a son. A little after midnight on that, the sixth night of Rama's exile, Dasha-ratha dies.

Ministers dispatch envoys to fetch Bhárata from Kékaya in order to perform Dasha-ratha's funeral rites and install him as king. Bhárata returns and learns to his horror of his mother's crimes. Refusing the kingship that is pressed upon him, Bhárata vows to bring Rama back from the forest and departs for Chitra-kuta with a vast army.

At the hermitage, Bhárata repeatedly tries to persuade Rama to return, but to no avail: Rama is resolved to keep his father's promise and his own. He consents only to give his slippers to Bhárata to display in token of his kingship. Bhárata returns home and begins the period of his viceroyalty from the neighbouring village of Nandi-grama. At the end of the book, Rama leaves Chitra-kuta with his brother and wife and enters the wilderness of Dándaka.

THE CENTRAL ISSUES

Indian epics are interested in a wide range of issues. In the course of their transmission a congeries of topics—mythological, philosophical, religious, and so on—was incorporated into them. Nevertheless, an integral theme of Sanskrit epic literature is kingship itself and its attendant problems: the acquisition, maintenance, and execution of royal power, the legitimacy of succession, and the predicament of transferring hereditary power within a royal dynasty. One explanation for why the problems of kingship were so insistently addressed by the epic texts may be the fact that they were new problems and, in their very nature, urgent.

During the three or four hundred years following the middle vedic age (c. 800 BCE), a critical period of dynamic transition, fundamental and enduring changes came about in the Indian way of life. Besides the growth of cities like Ayódhya and the rise of politically discrete polities like Kósala, the most important social development seems to have been a far more markedly defined hierarchical ordering of society. A second change concerns the extraordinary expansion of the role of the king. The nature of monarchy in this period appears unlike anything existing earlier. As the “Ramáyana” represents it, economic, social, political, and cultural welfare was now felt to depend exclusively on the king. For the first time, moreover, it became the conventional practice to transfer kingship through heredity.

Several consequences of hereditary monarchy are continually thrust upon our attention by their central position in the story of “Ayódhya.” One such feature is the yauva/rājya, “prince regency,” whereby the reigning king appoints his successor (as Dasha-ratha intends to appoint Rama). Another feature is intertribal—or what is now really interstate—marriage. Closely related to this is the politically significant practice of rājya/śulka, “the bride price consisting of the kingship (or kingdom),” which Dasha-ratha has offered to the king of Kékaya.

Moreover, the new restricted control of political power entailed a heightened competition attending its transfer. The antinomies involved in hereditary monarchical succession posed the constant threat of the sharpest possible intensification of the process: divisive and usually violent dynastic struggle.

Sanskrit epics were composed by more or less professional poets for the politically dominant group, the kshatriyas. Although the “Ramáyana” was also performed “on the streets and royal highways” of Ayódhya (“The Final Chapter,” “Ramáyana” Book 7, the Uttara/kāṇḍa 84.4), a popular function it has preserved to the present day, its primary and deter-minate audience was composed of kshatriyas. The issues addressed by the epic were those central to the lives of the kshatriyas who patronized it.

Thus, Valmíki, like his predecessors and contemporaries, was restricted to a particular set of themes. But when we compare the “Ramáyana” with other examples of epic literature, it seems evident that Valmíki found the previous treatments deficient not only aesthetically but ethically as well.

As the “Maha-bhárata” makes clear, the early epic tradition had acknowledged, if sometimes reluctantly, only one means for the resolution of political and dynastic conflict: armed combat. In the “Maha-bhárata” the dispute of two claimants for the succession to the Kuru throne is resolved only by a cataclysmic struggle that spirals out to engulf the entire Indian world.

For Valmíki, on the other hand, violence becomes, quite literally, the strategy of the inhuman. In Book Four, among the monkey princes in Kishkíndha, force is explicitly promoted as the only correct means of dealing with infringements of righteousness. In the sixth book, in Lanka, once more, the struggle for political power among brother demons is settled by the sword.

These incidents establish instructive parallels with the events of “Ayódhya.” Bhárata too has the chance to displace his elder brother, Rama, in dynastic succession, while Rama himself is dispossessed and driven from his country through a tyrant’s unrighteous conduct. But the naked violence and unscrupulous political opportunism we encounter in Kishkíndha and Lanka are rigorously excluded from the city of Ayódhya. For civilized society the poet inculcates, by positive precept and negative example, and with a sometimes numbing insistence, a powerful new code of conduct: hierarchically ordered, unqualified submission.

Everyone in “Ayódhya” expects Bhárata to mount a struggle for power. This was the established pattern of behavior, and the “Maha-bhárata” narrates in full the tragic consequences of this principle, which historical kings throughout the period—the young Ashóka, for example—tried to forestall by the summary execution of virtually all possible claimants, elder brothers among them. For Valmíki such struggle must be averted at all costs. The way to obviate this deadly antagonism is by the doctrine of unconditional submission of the younger to the elder brother.

The “Maha-bhárata” is no doubt sensitive to the desperate dilemma of living made possible only through killing. But its interrogations are indecisive; it can conceive of no solution except the final one in heaven. Valmíki altogether inverts the priorities both literature and history had valorized, asking incredulously:

How, after all, could a son kill his father, whatever the extremity, or a brother his brother, Sáumitri, his very own breath of life?
 “Ayódhya” 91.6

The code of behavior Valmíki prescribes in this context has a practical as well as an ethical dimension. If hereditary power could not be transferred smoothly, the consequences could be disastrous. In addition to this practical vocation, the ethics represents a new and hopeful humanism in the realm of political behavior. Violence is brutality in the radical sense of the world, and belongs to the subhuman world of monkeys and demons.

Yet the poem itself urges us to penetrate the surface discourse to another set of references embedded in it. By both its explicit injunctions and the implications of its structure, “Ayódhya” invites and, in fact, has always been subject to wide social extension. “One must behave like Rama” is the later proverbial formulation. For Rama represents a comprehensive model of behavior, enacting in particular two roles that encompass communal life in its totality.

The first role is Rama’s absolute heteronomy. The status of junior members of the Indian household was, historically, not very dissimilar to that of slaves, both with respect to the father and, again, hierarchically among themselves. As Lákshmana and Bhárata submit to Rama, and as Rama himself submits and suffers, so all the orders of society are to recognize and observe the strict boundaries of hierarchical existence. Rama’s behavior is a paradigm to which all subordinates must conform.

On a second, socially symbolic level, Rama’s filial relationship with the king is brought into prominence. According to the paternalistic formulation of the text, the people are the prajāḥ, the “children,” of the king.

The institutionalization of dependency and loyalty would appear to be a major precondition for the centralization of power. The king comes to represent a superior kinship bond, drawing on and incorporating the symbolic power of those that had previously been dominant.

AESTHETIC AND LITERARY-HISTORICAL CONSIDERATIONS

When we speak of "Valmíki," we are using the name as a convenient, shorthand way of referring to the composer of the monumental "Ramáyana." But we should bear in mind that this text continued to be amplified even after Valmíki fixed the essential contours of the work; similarly, the monumental poem was itself not the beginning of the tradition, but a major synthesis of antecedent elements.

However, although the "Ramáyana" must represent the culmination of a long bardic tradition of heroic song, and although the monumental poet must have adopted certain motifs from folk literature as we find it represented, for example, in the Buddhist játakas, the poem is more easily considered as the first chapter in a new volume of Indian literary history than as the last of an old one.

The reader who comes to "Ayódhya" with an awareness of the literary character of late vedic myth and legend, the játakas, or other early Pali or Sanskrit Buddhist narratives, or of the central portions of the "Maha-bhárata," must be struck by the sophisticated artistry of the book, which nothing in the antecedent or contemporary literature had prepared him to expect.

Valmíki's versification unquestionably possesses a polish and grace that markedly differentiates it from anything known before. "Lyric" verses at the ends of cantos, for example, are designed to mark closure, either by recapitulating the action or by providing a synoptic preview of what is to come. There is no analogy for this device that I know of in early Indian literature. Furthermore, if the balladlike refrain style to which Valmíki is especially partial in "Ayódhya” has antecedents in the folk tradition, nowhere else do we find it employed with the same fine sense of proportion and restraint; and it is used only when there is compelling contextual motivation for the tone of pathos that it contributes.

Unlike much early Sankrit epic poetry, and oral epic in general, with its subordination of the line to the paragraph, the paragraph to the book, and the book to the whole, Valmíki is particularly interested in sculpting the memorable individual line, often by the use of almost classical rhetorical devices. The listener or reader is asked to pause and relish, as he had often not been asked before.

Perhaps the most impressive formal feature, and the most sophisticated aesthetic advance, is the construction of the book. “Ayódhya” is probably the most skillfully structured of the seven sections of the poem; the links of the plot are securely and tightly concatenated. Our sight is never allowed to wander as the story progresses toward the final conflict and resolution. And the progress has an implacable quality to it, marked by the stirring and at times vehement and bitter encounters between the principal characters, by sudden and compelling reversals, and the stimulation and frustration of our expectations.

Beyond the mere linear development of the action, we can discern two other narrative modes that function as formal correlatives to the major problematic of the story. The first is distinguished by its spatial continuity, the second by its temporal synchrony.

The narrative time span for approximately the first two-thirds of the book is extremely brief. The action of cantos

1–40 (1–4 and 7–12 excepted) occurs in a single day; 1–63 together occupy only ten days. Rama's departure produces a long ache rather than a single sharp pain. With so much of the story occupying so limited a temporal framework, we find a lingering, minute, examination of what action there is from multiple perspectives. Diachronic narration, interweaving the separate strands of the narrative, starts in canto 13, but soon a spatial discontinuity sets in. With Rama's departure from the city in canto 35, the narrative focus begins to alternate frequently: to Ayódhya (36–39), to Rama (40–41), to Ayódhya (42), back to Rama (43–50), to Ayódhya (51–87), to Rama (88–91), to Bhárata (92).

Rama's fate is not his alone; his family as well as the entire community are involved in it. From the hero's banishment result dilemmas of every sort—social, political, ethical. We witness each successive predicament as it is individually addressed. At the same time, the central importance of Rama is continually underscored, and, his response juxtaposed to those of the other characters, distinguishing its uniqueness.

A rather more subtle narrative procedure is discernible in the synchronous mode. Here the narrative does not move directly forward but retraces itself to examine the same narrative time frame from two different vantage points. An expressive example occurs in cantos 50–58. In canto 50 Rama reaches the grove of asceticism and settles down to his life in exile. At that very hour, back in Ayódhya, Dasha-ratha recovers at last the memory of the evil deed of his youth: long ago he had slain a young ascetic and had been cursed by the boy's father. Now blind and feeble and as good as childless, Dasha-ratha is reduced to a condition identical to that of the seer he bereaved, while Rama, the son whom Kausálya accuses her husband of having destroyed, has at the same moment been transformed into an ascetic of the sort Dasha-ratha murdered.

The synchronicity of the narrative here helps to make manifest a complex and richly suggestive set of latent correspondences. One further effect it has is to reinforce a dominant theme: the role of fate.

THE PHILOSOPHY

It has long been recognized that fate plays a central role in much epic poetry, but considerable variation can be discerned among the different traditions. Achilles may be doomed to choose between a short life of heroic glory and a long but obscure existence; nevertheless, the choice is his and he knows it. The characters of the "Ramáyana" believe themselves to be denied all freedom of choice; what happens to them may be the result of "their" own doing, but they do not understand how this is so and consequently can exercise no control. This essential difference implies another, equally weighty.

Since the Greek hero in large measure makes and is aware of making his own fate, fate carries with it a substantial element of justice. The fate of Rama and others is prepared for them, at some plane beyond their intervention or even comprehension. "Justice" never enters the picture. Further, since in the archaic Greek world fate has both a cosmic dimension and an aspect of justice, the gods can guarantee the whole process as guardians of a just and moral order. Significantly, gods play no role whatever in “Ayódhya.” There is a mechanical quality to the course of human affairs.

In the Ayodhyā/kāṇḍa man is prohibited from making his destiny, and cannot truly comprehend the cause of his suffering. Fate—daiva, “what comes from the gods;” kāla, “time;” adr̥ṣṭa, “the unforeseeable;” kṛtānta, “doom” or “destiny”—is something one cannot understand and against which one cannot struggle. Rama has no choice; no one does. Choice is replaced by chance, and action is nothing more than reaction.

The doubts and hesitations in the face of so paralyzing an axiom are not, however, suppressed; Lákshmana throughout much of the epic and the minister Jabáli in canto 100 of “Ayódhya” urge the antithetical position: reliance on puruṣa/kāra, “human effort,” “free will.” But these characters are only foils, supplying a pretext for Rama to advance his uncompromising position. His own convictions are never affected.

This fatalism also takes on, in the recurrent appeal to karma, a more specific shape. Though the word karma seems not to be used in so technical a sense in the “Ramáyana,” the belief is clearly present that there exists a latent and unfailing mechanism of retributive justice for transgressions committed in the past, usually in a former life. No other explanation is ever available to the characters in the midst of their suffering.

The cause of sorrow is hidden in a vast obscurity that effectively renders hopeless any attempt to remedy it—or to have prevented it. Only once is the connection ever perceived (by Dasha-ratha, sargas 57–58) between a specific deed and its grievous consequences, which might serve to explain or justify suffering. But Dasha-ratha's deed was accidental; the inscrutability of retribution is only intensified.

THE CHARACTERS

If the style and narrative organization of "Ayódhya" often show great and easily accessible artistry, it may be more difficult for the modern reader to evaluate the quality of characterization. Two distinct groups of characters seem to present themselves: those, on the one hand, who possess the uneven contours of imperfect human beings, depths where we can hear the cacophonous resonances of familiar emotions and the many tones of moral uncertainty; and those, on the other hand, who are more regular and flat, with almost emblematic features.

Dasha-ratha, Kaikéyi, and Kausálya have a natural unevenness. They command full and complex emotional and moral registers. Choices confront them with which they must grapple; they suffer and in their suffering engage in a painful and very human process of self-recognition. Yet we perceive this only if we search for it; the culmination of these processes is rarely allowed into the foreground of the narrative.

Valmíki is uninterested in these contingent characters. The poet's indifference is, of course, partly a result of the fact that Rama and those who directly participate in his sacrifice—Lákshmana, Sita, and Bhárata—are the principal focus of his attention. But Valmíki's unconcern has some other origin, which will become apparent if we examine the characterization of the second set.

The reader will probably be struck, despite the driving momentum of the action, by a feeling of stasis in these four characters. They do not grow or change in the course of the narrative, or develop through inner struggle in the presence of moral choice. Unlike Kaikéyi or Dasha-ratha, they define themselves in relation to others with an immutable and unnatural consistency.

Rama and the others are evidently designed to be monovalent paradigms of conduct. Valmiki has not only an aesthetic intention but also a didactic purpose. The specific dimension of each of these four moral great figures is encapsulated in a formulaic, often alliterative, epithet, which augments the impression of stasis. Rama is the “champion of righteousness” (dharmabhrātā varah); Bhárata “a man of brotherly love” (bhrātrivatsalah); Lákshmana “marked with goodness” (śubhalakṣaṇah) in devotedly serving his elder brother; Sita is “like the daughter of the gods” (surasut/ōpamā), by reason of both her beauty and the virtue (that is, unwavering fidelity to her husband) that in Indian culture beauty is so often said to reflect.

The two sets of characters thus serve very different literary functions. The four central ones embody permanent moral values in a society marked by generalized contingency. The others (and this is the only sort known to the poets of the central portion of the “Maha-bhárata”) typify precisely that uncertainty, hesitancy, and vacillation. We may find it hard to respond to the former, since they will necessarily lack moral variety. But we must remember that if they do not manifest a recognizable human complexity it is because they were never intended to do so; Rama’s “true feelings” will remain secret, and properly so, for they are quite irrelevant to the poem's purposes. The didactic exigencies of the work required perfect moral types, and perfection, by definition, does not alter.

THE TEXT, ANNOTATIONS, AND TRANSLATION

The critical edition of Valmíki's "Ramáyana," upon which this translation is based, is occasionally subject to question. Thus, when I found myself in serious disagreement with the editor, I emended and translated as I thought necessary. All departures from the constituted text are listed in an appendix to the translation (and explained in the notes published separately on the CSL website).

I have kept before me all the medieval commentaries on the Ayodhyā/kāṇḍa that are available in print. My admiration for the learning and perspicacity of the commentators is as great as my indebtedness to them. Many of the verses owe their English shape directly to the exegetical labors of these scholiasts.

All translators acutely feel the obligation of not disappointing their author. Valmíki has substantial elements of genius, and I have striven to discharge the duty his genius imposes. "Ayódhya" is roughly two-thirds the size of the Odyssey, and there is bound to be a certain amount of chaff in it. It is in large part an oral composition; the repetitions of formula and epithet are as essential to it as any other literary or narrative feature; these can no longer simply be thrown overboard at the whim of the translator. It is a heroic epic, too, and for that sort of literature a truly appropriate diction is no longer available. The contemporary translator of the Greek epic has behind him some four hundred years of attempts at producing an English Homer. The Sanskritist works in a tradition both much more recent and less useful, and cannot safely assume that a single problem, whether philological or literary, has already been solved. He must start from the ground up—in fact from the very word dharma—and the only reasonable hope he may entertain is to have cleared some of the ground satisfactorily.

The preceding is a highly condensed version of SHELDON I. POLLOCK's original introduction to his Princeton translation of "Ayódhya" (pp. 3–76) to which the interested reader is referred for an in-depth analysis of the work. TIME PASSED and then one day King Dasha-ratha, the 1.1 delight of the Raghus, spoke to Bhárata, his son by Kaikéyi: “My mighty son, your mother’s brother Yudhájit, the son of the king of Kékaya, has come and is waiting to take you back home with him.” When he had heard what Dasha-ratha told him, Kaikéyi’s son Bhárata prepared to depart with Shatrúghna. Taking leave of his father, of tireless Rama and of his mothers, the hero, the best of men, went off with Shatrúghna. Delighted to have Bhárata and Sha- 1.5

 city, to the great satisfaction of his father. There Bhárata lived with his brother, enjoying the warm hospitality of his uncle Ashva-pati, who showered him with all the affection one shows a son. And yet, as the mighty brothers stayed on, their every desire satisfied, they often thought with longing of aged King Dasha-ratha.

The great king likewise often thought of his two absent sons, Bhárata and Shatrúghna, the equals of great Indra and Váruna. For he cherished every one of the four bulls among men, as if they were four arms extending from his body.
 But still, of all of them, it was mighty Rama who brought 2.10 his father the greatest joy. For he surpassed his brothers in virtue just as the self-existent Brahma surpasses all other beings. In Bhárata’s absence Rama and powerful Lákshmana showed reverence to their godlike father. Following his father’s orders, righteous Rama did all that was required to please and benefit the people of the city. He scrupulously did all that his mothers required of him and attended to his gurus' requirements with strict punctuality. Thus Dasha-ratha was pleased with Rama's conduct and character, as were the brahmans, the merchants and all who lived in the realm.

Rama was always even-tempered and kind-spoken. Even 1.15 if he were to be harshly addressed, he would not answer back. He would be satisfied with a single act of kindness, whatever its motive, and would ignore a hundred injuries, so great was his self-control. With good men—men advanced in years, virtue and wisdom—he would converse at every opportunity, even during breaks in his weapons practice. He was of noble descent on both sides of his family, he was upright and cheerful, truthful and honest. Aged brahmans had seen to his training, men who were wise in the ways of righteousness and statecraft. And thus he understood the true nature of righteousness, statecraft and personal pleasure. He was retentive and insightful, knowledgeable and adept in the social proprieties. He was learned in the sci- 1.20 ences and skilled in the practice of them as well. He was an excellent judge of men and could tell when it was appropriate to show his favor or withhold it. He knew the right means for collecting revenue and the accepted way of regulating expenditure. He had achieved preeminence in the sum total of the sciences, even the most complex.

Only after satisfying the claims of righteousness and statecraft would he give himself up to pleasure, and then never immoderately. He was a connoisseur of the fine arts and understood all aspects of political life. He was proficient in training and riding horses and elephants, eminently knowledgeable in the science of weapons, and esteemed throughout the world as a master chariot fighter. He could head a charge and give battle and lead an army skillfully. He was invincible in combat, even if the gods and ásuras themselves were to unite in anger against him. He was never spiteful, 1.25 haughty or envious, and he had mastered his anger. He would never look down on any creature nor bow to the will of time. By his eminent virtues the prince won the esteem of people throughout all the three worlds, for he was patient as the earth, wise as Brihas·pati, and mighty as Indra, Shachi's lord. Rama's virtues were prized by all the people, a source of joy to his father, and lent the prince himself such splendor as the sun derives from its shining beams. His conduct and invincible valor made him so like one of the gods who guard the world that Earth herself desired to have him as her master.

Now, as King Dasha·ratha, slayer of enemies, observed the many incomparable virtues of his son, he fell to thinking. In his heart he cherished this single joyous thought: "When 1.30 shall I see my dear son consecrated? His one desire is that the world should prosper, he shows compassion to all creatures and is loved in the world even more than I, like a cloud laden with rain. He is as mighty as Yama or Shakra, wise as Brihas·pati, steady as a mountain, and far richer in virtues than I. O that at my age I might go to heaven seeing my son holding sway over this entire land."

Recognizing that his son was endowed with these consummate virtues, the great king consulted with his advisers and chose him to be prince regent. The lord of earth then 1.35 convened the chief men of the land from the various cities and provinces in which they lived. The nobles arrived and in the different places he assigned to them they solemnly took their seats, facing the king. The lord of men paid his respects to the nobles and the men of the city and provinces, and as they sat deferentially around him he resembled Indra, the thousand-eyed lord, surrounded by the deathless gods.

KING DASHA·RATHA, lord of earth, called the whole as- 2.1
sembly to order, and, rumbling like a storm cloud, his loud voice deep and resonant as a bass drum, he made this incomparable speech to their delight and benefit: “The whole world has long been under the protection of Ikshváku kings. It is my desire to ensure its well-being, for continued happiness is its due. I myself have always kept to the path my ancestors followed and watched over my subjects unremittingly, to the best of my ability. And, in my striving for the 2.5
benefit of the entire world, my body has grown old in the shade of the white parasol. I have lived a life of many, countless, years, and now I crave repose for this aged body of mine. I have grown weary bearing the burden of righteousness for the world. For it is heavy, one must have self-discipline to bear it and the royal powers it encompasses.

I seek respite by entrusting my subjects’ welfare to the care of my son, with the approval of all you twice-born men assembled here. My eldest son was born resembling me in every virtue. He is a conqueror of enemy fortresses, as powerful as Indra, breaker of fortresses. It is my pleasure 2.10 superior master in him. Once I have ensured the well-being of this land by entrusting it to this son of mine, I shall be free from care.”

So the king spoke, and the nobles rejoiced at his words like peacocks at the rumble of a rain-laden cloud. They fully recognized that the aim of their aged king, Dasha-ratha, was embraced in the wisdom of righteousness and statecraft, and when they had reflected upon it they replied: “You are old, your majesty, and have lived many, countless, 2.15 years. You should consecrate Rama as prince regent of the land.” But when the king heard their reply he pretended not to know it was their heart’s desire, and in order to test them he asked: “How can it be that, while I am ruling the land in righteousness, you want to see my son become prince regent?”

In concert with the men of the city and provinces they answered great Dasha-ratha: “Your majesty, the virtues of your son are many and excellent. They are divine virtues, which make valiant Rama the equal of Shakra and elevate him far above all other Ikshvákus, lord of the peoples. All 2.20 the world knows Rama to be a decent man, for truth and righteousness are his first concern. And he is wise in the ways of righteousness, true to his word, a man of character and never spiteful. He is forbearing, conciliatory, kind-spoken, grateful and self-disciplined. He is gentle, firm of purpose, ever capable and unspiteful. He speaks kindly to all people, and yet he always tells the truth. He shows reverence for aged and deeply learned brahmans. of the gods, ásuras and men. Whenever he goes forth with Saumítri to battle in defense of a village or city, he always returns triumphant. And coming back from battle on chariot or elephant, Rama always stops to ask the men of the city after their welfare as if they were his kinsmen—about their sons, sacred fires, wives, servants and students, without omission and in due order, just as a father might ask his sons, his own flesh and blood. ‘Do your students obey you? Are they prompt in their tasks?’ This is how Rama, tiger among men, always questions us. 2.25-26

When misfortune strikes anyone Rama feels the sorrow keenly, and he takes the pleasure a father might in all the people’s celebrations. He is a great archer, a man who tells the truth, who seeks the counsel of the aged and is master of his senses. How fortunate you are to be blessed with a son like your Rághava, who, like Marícha Káshyapa, has every virtue a son should have. The people of the kingdom and in this the foremost of cities wish the celebrated Rama strength, health and long life—all the people of the city and the provinces, outsiders as well as intimates. And at dawn and at dusk women young and old alike devoutly worship all the gods for glorious Rama’s sake. By your grace, O god, let what they pray for come to pass. Grant, great king, that we may see Rama become prince regent, your son who is dark as the blue lotus, and deadly to his every enemy. O god, your godlike son is committed to the good of all the world, and so for our good, granter of boons, please consecrate the exalted prince joyfully and without delay.” 2.30

ALL AROUND HIM they held out their hands cupped like lotuses, and the king acknowledged them, adding these kind and beneficial words: “Ah, how overjoyed I am. You have magnified my grandeur beyond all measure that you should want my beloved eldest son to become prince regent.” 3.1

When the king had paid the brahmins this honor in return he addressed Vasíshtha and Vama-deva as the others stood listening. “This is the majestic, auspicious month of Chaitra, when the woods are in full bloom. Let all the preparations be made for Rama’s installation as prince regent.” “It shall be done,” the two brahmins replied with joy and delight as they approached the lord of the world, “just as you command.” Then the splendid king said to Sumántra, “Please bring Rama, my accomplished son, here at once.” Sumántra assented and by order of the king went in his chariot to fetch Rama, best of chariot-fighters. 3.5

Meanwhile the kings who were seated there—the eastern, northern, western and southern kings, aryan and barbarian, and others who lived in the forest and mountain regions—all paid homage to King Dasha-ratha, as the gods do to Vása-sava. From the terrace of the palace where he stood in their midst like Vása-sava among the Maruts, the royal seer watched his son approaching in his chariot. Rama was the very image of the king of gandhárvas, and renowned throughout the world for his manliness as well. His arms were long, his strength immense, and he carried himself like a bull elephant in rut. He was extremely handsome and his face had the lovely glow of moonlight. With his beauty and nobility he ravished both the sight and the hearts of men. He was like the rain that refreshes people parched by summer’s heat, 3.10 and the lord of men could not get enough of gazing at him as he drew near.

Sumántra helped Rághava down from his splendid chariot and followed at the rear, hands cupped in reverence, as Rama made his way into his father's presence. Accompanied 3.15 by the charioteer, Rághava, bull among men, went to see his father, ascending to the rooftop terrace lofty as Mount Kailása's peak. With hands cupped in reverence Rama came before his father. He prostrated himself and, announcing his name, did obeisance at his father's feet. Gazing at his dear son bowed down beside him with hands cupped in reverence, the king drew him up by his clasped hands and embraced him. The majestic king then directed Rama to the throne made ready for him, a splendid one brilliantly set with gems and gold. As Rághava sat down, the throne seemed to glow more brightly still from the prince's own luster, like Mount Meru when the bright sun rises. As the 3.20 autumn sky, for all its bright planets and constellations, is illuminated still further by the moon, so was the assembly hall lit up by the radiance Rama shed.

Dasha-ratha observed his dear son with keen satisfaction. It was as if he were looking in a mirror and seeing an enhanced reflection of himself. The king, and most blessed of fathers, turned to his son with a smile and in words Káshya-pa might once have used with Indra, lord of gods, he said: "Rama, my dear son, you were born of my eldest wife—a worthy son of a worthy woman—and you are most virtuous. And since by your virtues you have won the loyalty of these my subjects, you shall become prince regent on the day of Pushya's conjunction. You are by nature disciplined and virtuous, as much as one could desire. But still, in spite of these virtues, I shall give you some beneficial advice, my son, because of my affection for you. Impose even stricter discipline on yourself, exercise constant self-control and avoid all the vices that spring from desire and anger. Actively concern yourself with both overt and covert activities, to retain the loyalty of all your subjects, from the ministers down. He who protects the earth while keeping the people content and loyal will give his allies cause to rejoice like the deathless gods when they obtained nectar. So hold yourself in check, my son, and behave in this fashion." 3.25

Upon hearing this speech Rama's friends hurried off bearing the good news, and at once conveyed it to Kausálya. The excellent lady directed that gold and cows and an assortment of precious objects be given to those who brought the news. Rághava, meanwhile, after doing obeisance to the king, mounted the chariot and started back to his splendid dwelling amid the acclaim of the multitude. When the townsmen heard the king's announcement, it was as if they had secured some longed-for object and, on taking leave of the lord of men, they went home and worshipped the gods in deep delight. 3.30

AFTER THE TOWNSMEN had gone the king held further consultation with his counsellors. When he learned what they had determined the lord declared with determination: "Tomorrow is Pushya, so tomorrow my son Rama, his eyes as coppery as lotuses, shall be consecrated as prince regent." 4.1

Retiring then to his private chamber, King Dasha-ratha instructed the charioteer Sumántra to fetch Rama again. Upon receiving his orders the charioteer set out at once for Rama's abode to fetch him. The guards informed Rama that Sumántra had returned, and as soon as he learned of his arrival he felt uneasy. Rama had him shown in at once. "Tell me the reason for your returning," he said, "and omit nothing." The charioteer replied, "The king wishes to see you. Such is the message, but you of course must be the judge of your comings and goings." Such were the charioteer's words, and, upon hearing them, Rama hurried out and went to the palace to see the lord of men once more. 4.5

When word was brought that Rama had arrived, King Dasha-ratha had him shown into his chamber, anxious to pass on the important news. As majestic Rághava entered the residence he caught sight of his father, and at a distance prostrated himself, cupping his hands in reverence. He bowed low until the protector of the earth bade him rise and embraced him. Then, directing him to a splendid seat, the king once again addressed him: "Rama, I am old, my life has been long. I have enjoyed all the pleasures I desired. I have performed hundreds of sacrifices rich in food, with lavish priestly stipends. The child I wanted—and you are he—was born to me, a son who has no peer on earth today, the very best of men. I have given alms, offered sacrifices and studied the scriptures. I have experienced every pleasure, everything I wanted—and thus, my mighty son, I have discharged all my debts, to the gods, the seers, my ancestors, the brahmans and to myself. further required of me except your consecration. Therefore you must do for me what I am about to tell you.

All the subjects today expressed their wish to have you for their king, and so, my dear son, I will consecrate you as prince regent. But there is more, Rama: I have had dreams lately, inauspicious, ominous dreams. Great meteors and lightning bolts out of a clear sky have been falling nearby with a terrible crash. The astrologers also inform me, Rama, that my birth star is obstructed by hostile planets, Angáraka, Rahu and the sun. When such portents as these appear it usually means a king is about to die or meet with some dreadful misfortune. You must therefore have yourself consecrated, Rághava, before my resolve fails me. For the minds of men are changeable. Today the moon has reached Punarvasu, just to the east of Pushya; tomorrow, the astrologers predict, its conjunction with Pushya is certain. On this very Pushya day you must have yourself consecrated—I feel a sense of great urgency. Tomorrow, slayer of enemies, I will consecrate you as prince regent. 4.20

Therefore today you and your wife must take a vow to remain chaste this night, to fast and sleep upon a bed of darbha grass. Have your friends guard you warily today at every turn, for there are many impediments to affairs of this sort. I believe the best time for your consecration is precisely while Bhárata is absent from the city. Granted, your brother keeps to the ways of the good, defers to his elder brother, and is righteous, compassionate and self-disciplined. Still, 4.25

Once told his consecration was set for the next day, Rama was given leave to go, and after doing obeisance to his father, he went home. In keeping with the king's instructions regarding the consecration, he entered his house but then left immediately and went to his mother's apartment. There in the shrine-room he saw her, clothed in linen, solemnly and silently praying for his royal fortune. Sumíttra and Lákshmana had already come, and Sita had been sent for as soon as they heard the news of Rama's consecration. At that moment Kausályá stood with her eyes closed, while Sumíttra, Sita and Lákshmana were seated behind her. From the moment she received word that her son was to be consecrated as prince regent on Pushya day, she had been controlling her breathing and meditating on the Primal Being, Janárdana. 4.30

While she was engaged in these observances Rama approached her and did obeisance. Then to her delight he said: “Mother, my father has appointed me to the task of protecting the people. On father's instructions my consecration will take place tomorrow. And as Father, with his priests and preceptors, directs, Sita and I both are to fast tonight. Please see that any auspicious rites appropriate for my consecration tomorrow are performed today on behalf of Vaidéhi and me.” 4.35

Hearing him say what she had so long desired, Kausálya spoke to Rama in words muffled with sobs of joy: "Rama, my child, long may you live. May all who block your way be vanquished. And when you are invested with sovereignty may you bring joy to my kinsmen and Sumitra's. Truly it was under a lucky star I bore you, my dear son, since by your virtues you have won the favor of your father, Dasha-ratha. Truly the vows of self-denial I made to the lotus-eyed Primal Being were not in vain, since the royal fortune of the Ikshvákus will pass to you, my son." 4.40

So his mother spoke, and Rama then turned to his brother. He smiled as he looked at him sitting diffidently nearby, hands cupped in reverence, and he said: "Come, Lákshmana, rule this land with me. Sovereignty falls to your share, too, for you are my second self. You too shall enjoy every pleasure you desire, Saumítri, and all the fruits of kingship, for the kingship, and life itself, I covet only for your sake." So Rama spoke to Lákshmana, and then, doing obeisance to his mothers and bidding Sita take leave of them, he returned home. 4.45

WHEN HE HAD given Rama his instructions regarding the consecration on the coming day, the lord of men summoned his family priest Vasíshta and said: "Go, ascetic, and assist Kakútstha and his wife in undertaking a fast today, so that my son, a man strict in his vows, may gain majesty, glory and kingship." "So be it," said the holy Vasíshta, greatest of Vedic scholars, in reply to the king, and he went himself to Rama's residence. 5.1

Arriving at Rama's dwelling, which looked like a bank of silvery clouds, the great sage entered and drove through the three courtyards in his chariot. At the arrival of this venerable seer, Rama hurried from his house in great excitement, to show him veneration. Hurrying to the side of the wise man's chariot and lending him support, he helped him to climb down. The family priest, noting Rama's deference, addressed him with compliments, and then, to the delight of the prince, who was deserving of every kindness, he said: "Your father is well-disposed toward you, Rama; you shall become prince regent. Today you and Sita must fast. For tomorrow morning the lord of men, your father Dasha-ratha, shall consecrate you as prince regent, with all the joy Náhushta felt in consecrating Yayāti."

So the sage spoke, and then, with the appropriate Vedic verses, he assisted Vaidéhi and Rama, a man of strict vows, in undertaking their fast. Afterward, when he had been duly honored by Rama, the king's guru took leave of Kakútshta and left his residence. Rama remained awhile sitting there in the company of his affable friends. Then, with their best wishes he took leave of them all and went inside. Delight filled the throngs of men and women in Rama's house so that for the moment it resembled a pond of blooming lotuses, where cheerful birds are flocking.

As Vasísththa emerged from Rama's kingly residence he saw the highway filled with people. Curious onlookers, crowd upon crowd of them, were jamming every inch of the royal highways in Ayódhya. Like waves the crowds dashed together, and the royal highway sent up a roar of delight, like the sound the ocean makes. The city was being decked with fresh wildflower garlands, banners run up high above the houses, the thoroughfares swept and sprinkled. All the people who lived in Ayódhya—women, children and the aged alike—were eagerly waiting for sunrise and Rama's consecration. They were anxious to witness Ayódhya's greatest festival, a source of joy to the people, and an occasion for their adornment. The royal highway was so jammed that the family priest seemed to part a flood of people as he slowly made his way back to the palace. He ascended to the rooftop terrace, like a mountain peak wreathed in white clouds, and rejoined the lord of men as Brihas-pati might rejoin Shakra. 5.20

Seeing he had come, the king left his throne and questioned him, and Vasíshtha informed him that his mission had been carried out. Given leave then by his guru, the king dismissed the multitudes of people and withdrew into his private chamber, like a lion into a mountain cave. His palace, rivalling great Indra's palace, was crowded with womenfolk in rich attire, and as the king entered he shed over it as brilliant a light as the hare-marked moon sheds over the sky with its crowds of stars.

WHEN THE FAMILY PRIEST had gone Rama bathed and then, restraining his desire, he worshipped Naráyana in the company of his large-eyed wife. With bowed head he held out the oblation vessel. Then, in accordance with the ritual precepts, he offered the clarified butter in a blazing fire to the great divinity. He consumed the remains of the oblation and earnestly made his wish. Meditating on the god Naráyana, maintaining silence and restraining his desire, the prince lay 6.1

down to sleep with Vaidéhi on a thick-spread bed of kusha grass in the majestic sanctuary of Vishnu. With one watch of the night remaining, he awoke and saw to the decorating of the entire house. This done, and hearing the pleasant voices of the bards, genealogists and panegyrists, he began to intone his prayers in deep concentration, performing the morning worship. Dressed in spotless linen, his head bowed low, he glorified Vishnu, crusher of Madhu, and had the brahmans pronounce their blessings. 6.5

The deep sweet sound of their benedictions was echoed by the sound of pipes and pervaded all Ayódhya. All the people who lived in Ayódhya were elated to hear that Rághava and Vaidéhi had undertaken their fast. All the people of the town had heard about Rama's consecration, and so when they saw night brighten into dawn they began to adorn the city. On sanctuaries that looked like mountain peaks wreathed in white clouds, at crossroads and thoroughfares, on shrines and watchtowers, on the shops of merchants rich in their many kinds of wares, on the majestic, rich dwellings of householders, on all the assembly halls and on prominent trees, colorful banners and pennants were run up high. There were troupes of actors and dancers, there were minstrels singing and their voices could be heard everywhere, so pleasing to the ear and heart. In public squares and private houses people spoke with one another in praise of Rama, now that his consecration was at hand. Even children playing in groups at their front doors talked together in praise of Rama. 6.10 6.15

The townsmen beautified the royal highway, too, for Rama's consecration, placing offerings of flowers there and perfuming it with fragrant incense. And anticipating that night would fall, they set up lantern-trees for illumination everywhere along the thoroughfares. Thus the residents decorated their city. Afterward, eagerly waiting for Rama's consecration as prince regent, they grouped together in public squares and in assembly halls. And there in conversation with each other they sang the praises of the lord of the people: "Ah, what a great man our king is, the delight of the House of the Ikshvákus, to recognize that he is old and to be ready to consecrate Rama as king. What a blessing to us all that for a long time to come Rama will be the lord of earth and our protector. For Rághava can tell good people from bad, he is wise and righteous and not arrogant. He loves his brothers and shows us the same affection he shows to them. Long live the righteous king, blameless Dasha-ratha, by whose grace we shall witness the consecration of Rama!" 6.20

As the townsmen conversed in this fashion, the people of the provinces listened; for they too had come from every quarter when they got word of the event. The people of the provinces had come to the city from every quarter to witness Rama's consecration, and they filled his city to overflowing. And as the waves of people rolled in, one could hear a sound like that of the sea when its swell is raised on a full-moon night. The city, resembling Indra's residence, grew so noisy and congested everywhere with spectators arriving from the provinces that it looked like the ocean waters teeming with all the creatures of the deep. 6.25

 from the time of her birth, had happened to ascend to the rooftop terrace that shone like the moon. From the terrace Mánthara could see all Ayódhya—the king's way newly sprinkled, the lotuses and water lilies strewn about, the costly ornamental pennants and banners, the sprinkling of sandalwood water and the crowds of freshly bathed people. Seeing a nursemaid standing nearby, Mánthara asked, 7.5
 "Why is Rama's mother so delighted and giving away money to people, when she has always been so miserly? Tell me, why are the people displaying such boundless delight? Has something happened to delight the lord of earth? What is he planning to do?" Bursting with delight and out of sheer gladness the nursemaid told the hunchback Mánthara about the greater majesty in store for Rághava: "Tomorrow on Pushya day King Dasha-ratha is going to consecrate Rama Rághava as prince regent, the blameless prince who has mastered his anger."

When she heard what the nursemaid said, the hunchback was furious and descended straightway from the terrace that was like the peak of Mount Kailása. Consumed with rage, the malevolent Mánthara approached Kaikéyi as she lay upon her couch, and she said: "Get up, you foolish 7.10 woman! How can you lie there when danger is threatening you? Don't you realize that a flood of misery is about to overwhelm you? Your beautiful face has lost its charm. You boast of the power of your beauty, but it has proved to be as fleeting as a river's current in the hot season." So she spoke, and Kaikéyi was deeply distraught at the bitter words of the angry, malevolent hunchback. "Mánthara," she replied, "is something wrong? I can tell by the distress in your face how sorely troubled you are.”

Hearing Kaikéyi's gentle words the wrathful Mánthara spoke—and a very clever speaker she was. The hunchback grew even more distraught, and, with Kaikéyi's best interests at heart, spoke out, trying to sharpen her distress and turn her against Rághava: “Something is very seriously wrong, my lady, something that threatens to ruin you. For King Dasha-ratha is going to consecrate Rama as prince regent. I felt myself sinking down into unfathomable danger, stricken with grief and sorrow, burning as if on fire. And so I have come here, with your best interests at heart. When you are sorrowful, Kaikéyi, I am too, and even more, and, when you prosper, so do I. There is not the slightest doubt of this. You were born into a family of kings, you are a queen of the lord of earth. My lady, how can you fail to know that the ways of kings are ruthless? 7.15

Your husband talks of righteousness, but he is deceiving you; his words are gentle but he is cruel. You are too innocent to understand, and so he has utterly defrauded you like this. When expedient, your husband reassures you, but it is all worthless. Now that there is something of real worth he is ready to bestow it upon Kausálya. Having got Bhárata out of the way by sending him off to your family, the wicked man shall tomorrow establish Rama in unchallenged kingship. He is an enemy pretending to be your husband. He is like a viper, child, whom you have taken to your bosom and lovingly mothered. For what an enemy or a snake would do if one ignored them, King Dasha-ratha is now doing to 7.20 by establishing Rama in the kingship, dear child who has always known comfort, he will bring ruin upon you and your family. Kaikéyi, the time has come to act, and you must act swiftly, for your own good. You must save your son, yourself and me, my enchanting beauty.”

After listening to Mánthara's speech, the lovely woman rose from the couch and presented the hunchback with a lovely piece of jewelry. And, when she had given the hunchback the jewelry, Kaikéyi, most beautiful of women, said in delight to Mánthara: “What you have reported to me is the most wonderful news. How else may I reward you, Mánthara, for reporting such good news to me? I draw 7.30 no distinction between Rama and Bhárata, and so I am perfectly content that the king should consecrate Rama as king. You could not possibly tell me better news than this, or speak more welcome words, my well-deserving woman.
 For what you have told me I will give you yet another boon, something you might like more—just choose it!”

BUT MÁNTHARA WAS beside herself with rage and sor- 8.1 row. She threw the jewelry away and said spitefully: “You foolish woman, how can you be delighted at such a moment? Are you not aware that you stand in the midst of a sea of grief? It is Kausálya who is fortunate; it is her son the eminent brahmins will consecrate as the powerful prince regent tomorrow, on Pushya day. Once Kausálya secures in reverence, like a serving woman. Delight is truly in store 8.5 for Rama's exalted women, and all that is in store for your daughters-in-law is misery, at Bhárata's downfall."

Seeing how deeply distressed Mánthara was as she spoke, Queen Kaikéyi began to extol Rama's virtues: "Rama knows what is right, his gurus have taught him self-restraint. He is grateful, truthful and honest, and as the king's eldest son he deserves to be prince regent. He will protect his brothers and his dependents like a father; and long may he live!
How can you be upset, hunchback, at learning of Rama's consecration? Surely Bhárata as well, the bull among men, will obtain the kingship of his fathers and forefathers after Rama's one hundred years. Why should you be upset, Mán- 8.10 thara, when we have prospered in the past, and prosper now, and shall have good fortune in the future? For he obeys me even more scrupulously than he does Kausálya."

When she heard what Kaikéyi said, Mánthara was still more sorely troubled. She heaved a long and hot sigh and then replied: "You are too simpleminded to see what is good for you and what is not. You are not aware that you are sinking in an ocean of sorrow fraught with disaster and grief. Rághava will be king, Kaikéyi, and then the son of Rághava, while Bhárata will be debarred from the royal succession altogether. For not all the sons of a king stand in line for the kingship, my lovely. Were all of them to be so placed, grave misfortune would ensue. That is why 8.15 kings place the powers of kingship in the hands of the eldest, faultless Kaikéyi, however worthy the others. Like a helpless will be totally excluded from the royal succession and from its pleasures as well.

Here I am, come on your behalf, but you pay me no heed. Instead, you want to reward me in token of your rival's good luck! Surely once Rama secures unchallenged kingship he will have Bhárata sent off to some other country—if not to the other world! And you had to send Bhárata, a mere boy, off to your brother's, though knowing full well that proximity breeds affection, even in insentient things. Now Rághava will protect Lákshmana, just as Saumítri will protect Rama, for their brotherly love is as celebrated as that of the Ashvins. And so Rama will do no harm to Lákshmana, but he will to Bhárata without question. 8.20

So let your son go straight from Raja-griha to the forest. That is the course I favor, and it is very much in your own best interests. For in this way good fortune may still befall your side of the family—if, that is, Bhárata secures, as by rights he should, the kingship of his forefathers. Your child has known only comfort, and, at the same time, he is Rama's natural enemy. How could the one, with his fortunes lost, live under the sway of the other, whose fortunes are thriving? Like the leader of an elephant herd attacked by a lion in the forest, your son is about to be set upon by Rama, and you must save him. Then, too, because of your beauty's power you used to spurn your co-wife, Rama's mother, so proudly. How could she fail to repay that enmity? When Rama secures control of the land, Bhárata will be lost for certain. You must therefore devise some way of making your son the king and banishing his enemy this very day." 8.25 seers to lend assistance to the king of the gods, and he took you along. He set off toward the south, Kaikéyi, to the 9.10 Dándakas and the city called Vaijayánta. It was there that Timi-dhvaja ruled, the same who is called Shámbara, a great ásura of a hundred magic powers. He had given battle to Shakra, and the host of gods could not conquer him. In the great battle that followed, King Dasha-ratha was struck unconscious, and you, my lady, conveyed him out of battle.

But there, too, your husband was wounded by weapons, and once again you saved him, my lovely. And so in his gratitude he granted you two boons. Then, my lady, you said to your husband, ‘I shall choose my two boons when I want them,’ and the great king consented. I myself was unaware of this, my lady, until you yourself told me, long ago.

You must now demand these two boons of your husband: 9.15 the consecration of Bhárata and the banishment of Rama for fourteen years.

Now go into your private chamber, daughter of Ashvapati, as if in a fit of rage. Put on a dirty garment, lie down on the bare ground, and don't speak to him, don't even look at him. Your husband has always adored you, I haven't any doubt of it. For your sake the great king would even go through fire. The king could not bring himself to anger you, nor even bear to look at you when you are angry. He would give up his own life to please you. The lord of the land is powerless to refuse your demand. Dull-witted girl, 9.20 recognize the power of your beauty. King Dasha-ratha will offer gems, pearls, gold, a whole array of precious gifts—but pay no mind to them. Just keep reminding Dasha-ratha of those two boons he granted at the battle of the gods and ásuras. Illustrious lady, you must not let this opportunity pass you by.

When the great king Rághava helps you up himself and offers you a boon, then you must ask him for this one, first making sure he swears to it: 'Banish Rama to the forest for nine years and five, and make Bhárata king of the land, the bull among kings.' In this way Rama will be banished and cease to be 'the pleasing prince,' and your Bhárata, his rival eliminated, will be king. And by the time Rama returns 9.25 from the forest, your steadfast son and his supporters will have struck deep roots and won over the populace. I think it high time you overcame your timidity. You must forcibly prevent the king from carrying out Rama's consecration."

And so Mánthara induced her to accept such evil by disguising it as good, and Kaikéyi, now cheered and delighted, replied:

“Hunchback, I never recognized your excellence, nor how excellent your advice. Of all the hunchbacks in the land there is none better at devising plans. You are the only one who has always sought my advantage and had my interests at heart. I might never have known, hunchback, what the king intended to do. There are hunchbacks who are misshapen, crooked and hideously ugly—but not you, you are lovely, you are bent no more than a lotus in the breeze. Your chest is arched, raised as high as your shoulders, and, down below, your waist, with its lovely navel, seems as if it had grown thin in envy of it. Your girdle-belt beautifies your hips and sets them jingling. Your legs are set strong under you, while your feet are long. With your wide buttocks, Mánthara, and your garment of white linen, you are as resplendent as a wild goose when you go before me. 9.30

And this huge hump of yours, wide as the hub of a chariot wheel—your clever ideas must be stored in it, your political wisdom and magic powers. And there, hunchback, is where I will drape you with a garland made of gold, once Bhárata is consecrated and Rághava has gone to the forest. When I have accomplished my purpose, my lovely, when I am satisfied, I will anoint your hump with precious liquid gold. And for your face I will have them fashion an elaborate and beautiful forehead mark of gold and exquisite jewelry for you, hunchback. Being flattered in this fashion, she replied to Kaikéyi, who 9.40 still lay on her luxurious couch like a flame of fire on an altar:
“One does not build a dike, my precious, after the water is gone. Get up, apprise the king, and see to your own welfare!” Thus incited, the large-eyed queen went with Mánthara to her private chamber, puffed up with the intoxicating power of her beauty. There the lovely lady removed her pearl necklace, worth many hundred thousands, and her other costly and beautiful jewelry. And then, under the spell of the hunchback Mánthara’s words, the golden Kai-kéyi got down upon the floor and said to her: “Hunchback, 9.45 go inform the king that I will surely die right here unless Bhárata receives as his portion the land and Rághava, as his,
the forest.”

And, uttering these ruthless words, the lady put all her jewelry aside and lay down upon the ground bare of any spread, like a fallen kínnara woman. Her face enveloped in the darkness of her swollen rage, her fine garlands and ornaments stripped off, the wife of the lord of men grew distraught and took on the appearance of a darkened sky, when all the stars have set.

NOW, WHEN THE great king had given orders for Rágha- 10.1

tell his beloved wife the good news. But when the lord of the world saw her fallen on the ground and lying there in a posture so ill-befitting her, he was consumed with sorrow.
The guileless old man saw her on the floor, that guileful young wife of his, who meant more to him than life itself.
He began to caress her affectionately, as a great bull elephant in the wilderness might caress his cow wounded by the poisoned arrow of a hunter lurking in the forest. And, as he 10.5
caressed his lotus-eyed wife with his hands, sick with worry and desire, he said to her:

"I do not understand, my lady, why you should be angry.
Has someone offended you, or shown you disrespect, that you should lie here in the dust, my precious, and cause me such sorrow? What reason have you to lie upon the floor as if possessed by a spirit, driving me to distraction, when you are so precious to me? I have skilled physicians, who have been gratified in every way. They will make you well again. Tell me what hurts you, my lovely. Is there someone to whom you would have favor shown, or has someone aroused your disfavor? The one shall find favor at once, the other incur my lasting disfavor. Is there some guilty man who should be 10.10 freed, or some innocent man I should execute? What poor man should I enrich, what rich man impoverish? I and my people, we all bow to your will. I could not bring myself to thwart any wish of yours, not if it cost me my life. Tell me what your heart desires, for all the earth belongs to me, as far as the wheel of my power reaches."

So he spoke, and now encouraged she resolved to tell her hateful plan. She then commenced to cause her husband still greater pain. “No one has mistreated me, my lord, or shown me disrespect But there is one wish I have that I should like you to fulfill. You must first give me your promise that you are willing to do it. Then I shall reveal what it is I desire.” So his beloved Kaikéyi spoke, and the mighty king, hopelessly under the woman’s power, said to her with some surprise: “Do you not yet know, proud lady, that except for Rama, tiger among men, there is not a single person I love as much as you? Take hold of my heart, rip it out and examine it closely, my lovely Kaikéyi; then tell me if you do not find it true. Seeing that I have the power, you ought not to doubt me. I will do what will make you happy, I swear to you by all my acquired merit.” 10.15

His words filled her with delight, and she made ready to reveal her dreadful wish, which was like a visitation of death: “Let the three and thirty gods, with Indra at their head, hear how you in due order swear an oath and grant me a boon. Let the sun and moon, the sky, the planets, night and day, the quarters of space, heaven and earth, let all the gandhárvas and rákshasas, the spirits that stalk the night, the household gods in every house and all the other spirits take heed of what you have said. This mighty king, who is true to his word and knows the ways of righteousness, in full awareness grants me a boon—let the deities give ear to this for me.” 10.20

Thus the queen ensnared the great archer and called upon 10.25 witnesses. She then addressed the king, who in his mad passion had granted her a boon. “I will now claim the two boons you once granted me, my lord. Hear my words, your majesty. Let my son Bhárata be consecrated with the very rite of consecration you have prepared for Rághava. Let Rama withdraw to Dándaka wilderness and for nine years and five live the life of an ascetic, wearing hides and bark-cloth garments and matted hair. Let Bhárata today become the uncontested prince regent, and let me see Rághava depart 10.30 this very day for the forest.” When the great king heard Kaikéyi’s ruthless demands, he was shaken and unnerved, like a stag at the sight of a tigress. The lord of men gasped as he sank down upon the bare floor. “Oh damn you!” he cried in uncontrollable fury before he fell into a stupor, his heart crushed by grief.

Gradually the king regained his senses and then, in bitter sorrow and anger, he spoke to Kaikéyi, with fire in his eyes: “Malicious, wicked woman, bent on destroying this House!
Evil woman, what evil did Rama or I ever do to you? Rághava has always treated you just like his own mother. What reason can you have for trying to wreck his fortunes, of all people? It was sheer suicide to bring you into my home. 10.35
I did it unwittingly, thinking you a princess—and not a deadly poisonous viper. When praise for Rama’s virtues is on the lips of every living soul, what crime could I adduce as pretext for renouncing my favorite son? I would sooner renounce Kausálya, or Sumíttra, or sovereignty, or life itself, than Rama, who so cherishes his father.

The greatest joy I know is seeing my firstborn son. If I cannot see Rama, I shall lose my mind. The world might endure without the sun, or crops without water, but without Rama life could not endure within my body. Enough, then, 10.40 give up this scheme, you evil-scheming woman. I beg you! Must I get down and bow my head to your feet?" His heart in the grip of a woman who knew no bounds, the guardian of the earth began helplessly to cry, and as the queen extended her feet he tried in vain to touch them, and collapsed like a man on the point of death.

THE KING LAY THERE, in so unaccustomed a posture, so 11.1
 ill-befitting his dignity, like Yayāti himself, his merit exhausted, fallen from the world of the gods. But the woman was unafraid, for all the fear she awoke. She was misfortune incarnate and had yet to secure her fortunes. Once more she tried to force him to fulfill the boon. "You are vaunted, great king, as a man true to his word and firm in his vows. How then can you be prepared to withhold my boon?" So Kaikéyi spoke, and King Dasha-ratha, faltering for a moment, angrily replied: "Vile woman, mortal enemy! Will 11.5 you not be happy, will you not be satisfied until you see me dead, and Rama, the bull among men, gone to the forest? To satisfy Kaikéyi Rama must be banished to the forest, but if I keep my word in this, then I must be guilty of another lie. My infamy will be unequalled in the eyes of the people and my disgrace inevitable."

12.1 PUTRA|ŚOK'|ĀRDITAṃ pāpā viśaṃjñāṃ patitaṃ bhuvi
viveṣṭamānam udīkṣya s" Āikṣvākam idam abravīt:

While he was lamenting like this, his mind in a whirl, the sun set and evening came on. To the anguished king lost in lamentation, the night, adorned with the circlet of the moon, no longer seemed to last a mere three watches. Heaving burning sighs, aged King Dasha-ratha sorrowfully lamented in his anguish, his eyes fixed upon the sky. “I do not want you to bring the dawn—here, I cup my hands in supplication. But no, pass as quickly as you can, so that I no longer have to see this heartless, malicious Kaikéyi, the cause of this great calamity.” 11.10

But, with this, the king cupped his hands before Kaikéyi and once more, begging her mercy, he spoke: “Please, I am an old man, my life is nearly over. I am desolate, I place myself in your hands. Dear lady, have mercy on me for, after all, I am king. Truly it was thoughtless of me, my fair-hipped lady, to have said those things just now. Have mercy on me, please, my child. I know you have a heart.” So the pure-hearted king lamented, frantically and piteously, his eyes reddened and dimmed by tears, but the malicious, blackhearted woman only listened and made no reply. And as the king stared at the woman he loved but could not appease, whose demand was so perverse—for the exile of his own son—he once again was taken faint, overcome with grief, and dropped unconscious to the floor. 11.15

THE EVIL WOMAN watched as Aikshváka lay writhing unconscious on the ground where he had fallen, tortured with grief for his son. Then she spoke: 12.1

“How can you collapse like this and lie upon the floor, as though you deemed it a sin to fulfill the promise you made me? You must stand by your obligation. For people who understand the meaning of righteousness hold truth to be its essence. Now, I am simply appealing to truth and exhorting you to do what is right. Shaibya, the lord of the world, once promised his very own body to a hawk, and he actually gave it to the bird, your majesty, thereby attaining the highest goal. The same was true of mighty Alárka. When 12.5 a brahman versed in the Vedas begged him for his eyes, he plucked them out, his own two eyes, and gave them unflinchingly. The ocean, lord of rivers, respects the truth, keeping his narrow limits, and in accordance with the truth does not transgress the shore he pledged to keep. If you do not make good this pledge to me, my noble husband, then right before your eyes I will abandon my life, as you have abandoned me.”

So the shameless Kaikéyi pressed the king, and he could no more free himself from her snare than Bali could from Indra's. His heart began to beat wildly, his face was drained of color, he was like an ox struggling between the yoke and wheels. His eyes so clouded he could hardly see, barely 12.10 steadying himself by an act of will, the lord of earth said to Kaikéyi: “Once, in accordance with the sacred hymn, I took and held your hand in mine before the marriage fire. I now repudiate you, evil woman, as well as the son I fathered on you.”

Blind with rage, the wicked Kaikéyi again addressed the king in the harshest words at her command. “What are these venomous and cutting words you are speaking? Just have your son Rama brought here without delay. Not until you have placed my son on the throne, sent Rama to live in the forest and rid me of all my rivals will you have met your obligations.”

Subjected to this constant pressure, like a noble horse 12.15
prodded by a sharp goad, the king finally said: “I am bound by the bond of righteousness. My mind is failing me! I want to see righteous Rama, my beloved eldest son.”

When Kaikéyi heard the king’s words she immediately said to the charioteer on her own initiative, “Go! Bring Rama.” Then the righteous and majestic king, utterly joyless on account of his son, looked up at the charioteer through eyes red with grief and tried to speak to him. Hearing the pitiful sound and seeing the king’s desolate expression, Sumántra cupped his hands in reverence and withdrew some steps from his presence.

When in his desolation the lord of earth proved incapable 12.20 of speaking, Kaikéyi, who well knew her counsels, addressed Sumántra herself: “Sumántra, I will see Rama. Bring the handsome prince at once.” Thinking this meant all was well, he rejoiced with all his heart.

This is what the mighty charioteer thought, and he departed in great delight, eager to see Rághava. As he rushed out he noticed first the lords of earth at the door and then saw various wealthy townsmen assembling, taking their positions before the door.

 leaders of the army and the leading merchants joyfully con-

 had risen and Pushya day had come, the chief brahmans made the preparations for Rama's consecration. They set out golden ewers, a richly ornamented throne, a chariot draped with a resplendent tiger skin; water brought from 13.5 the holy confluence of the Ganges and Yámuna, and from all the other holy wells, pools and lakes, from rivers flowing east, west, north and south, and from all the oceans; honey, curds, clarified butter, parched grain, darbha grass, flowers and milk; golden and silver pots of grain decked with sap-rich twigs, and pots brimming with pure water and adorned with lotuses and water lilies.

A splendid yak-tail fan stood ready for Rama. It was inlaid with jewels, white and softly radiant as moonbeams. A white parasol, majestic and luminous as the full moon's disk, was set out in readiness for Rama's consecration. Standing 13.10 ready were a white bull, a flawless white horse and a majestic rutting elephant, fit for a king to ride. There were eight maidens to ensure good fortune, all adorned with jewelry; all sorts of musical instruments, panegyrists and others. Bringing with them the different sorts of princely equipment required for a royal consecration of the Ikshvákus, they all convened there by order of the king. But the lord of earth was nowhere to be seen. "Who will inform the king of our arrival?" they asked. "The sun has risen and wise Rama's consecration as prince regent is ready to begin, but we do not see the king."

As they were speaking, Sumántra, the honored attendant 13.15 of the king, said to all those lords of earth who had come from all over the land: "I can easily go and inquire, as my lords direct, why the king has not come out if he is now awake." With this, the master of ancient tales went to the door of the inner chamber, and there he spoke his blessings and sang the praises of Rághava's virtues. "Holy night is past, gracious day has begun. Awaken, tiger among kings, and attend forthwith to your duties. The brahmans, the leaders of the army and the merchants have come, your majesty. They await your presence. Awaken, Rághava." As 12.20 Sumántra, the charioteer and skilled counsellor, was singing his praises, the king became aware of him and said: "I have not been sleeping. Bring Rághava here at once." So King Dasha-ratha spoke, again ordering the charioteer. Hearing the king's command and bowing his head to him, he left the king's chamber, thinking there to be some good news.

As the charioteer entered onto the royal highway bedecked with banners and pennants, he could hear the people talking about Rama. Sumántra then saw the lovely residence of Rama, resplendent as Mount Kailása or the residence of Shakra. It was closed fast with massive gates, and adorned 13.25 with a hundred terraces. There were golden images atop its pinnacles and a gateway fashioned of gems and coral. It looked like a bank of autumn clouds, radiant as a grotto on Mount Meru, and was adorned with enormous wreaths of choice garlands. The charioteer proceeded on his horse-drawn chariot, observing the crowds that filled the great and opulent royal palace, and when he reached it, a shiver of delight passed through him. It resembled a mountain peak or a motionless cloud, with a complex of buildings more splendid than aerial palaces, and the charioteer made his way through it unchecked, like a dolphin through the gem-stocked sea.

THE MASTER OF ANCIENT TALES passed through the inner chamber door, where crowds of people thronged, and reached the courtyard. It was nearly empty except for the young men who stood guard, armed with bows and arrows and wearing polished earrings, wary, alert and unswervingly loyal. He saw the aged warders of the women stationed at the door. They were dressed in saffron-colored robes and richly ornamented, and stood watchfully holding their staffs. At the sight of him approaching they at once informed Rama and his wife, eager to announce the news. On receiving the message, Rághava at once had them usher in the charioteer, his father's confidant, for he was anxious for the news. The charioteer saw the slayer of enemies seated on a richly covered golden couch. He looked like Váishravana, lord of riches, in all his jewelry and with the precious sandalwood cream he had applied, red as a boar's blood, pure and fragrant. 14.1 14.5

Sita now was with him—like the star Chitra with the hare-marked moon—standing at his side with a yak-tail fan in her hand. He blazed like the sun with his natural radiance, and the charioteer greeted him, the granter of boons, with the deference in which he was practiced. His hands cupped in reverence, Sumántra, the honored attendant of the king, 14.10 asked the prince if he had passed the time agreeably, and slept and rested well. Then he said to him: “O god, worthy son of Kausálya, your father and Queen Kaikéyi wish to see you. Please go there without delay.”

So he spoke, and the splendid lion among men was delighted. He dutifully assented and then said to Sita: “My lady, the king and queen must surely have met and taken some counsel on my behalf relating to the consecration. The lady is agreeable and desires to please. Having divined his intention she must be urging the king in my favor, my lovely-eyed wife. A council’s mood will be reflected in the messenger it sends. Surely the king is going to consecrate me as prince regent this very day. So, then, I will go off at once and see the lord of earth. Remain here comfortably seated with your companions, and rejoice.” Dark-eyed Sita, esteemed by her lord, followed her husband as far as the door, uttering prayers for good fortune. 14.15

Catching sight of the crowds of eager people, he approached and greeted them. Then he mounted his splendid chariot, which glowed like fire. With the luster of its gleaming gold it nearly blinded the onlookers, while harnessed to it were blood horses almost the size of young elephants. As thousand-eyed Indra boards his swift chariot with its team of bays, Rághava boarded and sped away, ablaze with royal splendor. Raising a clamor like a storm cloud rumbling in the sky, he emerged majestically from his residence like the moon from a massive cloud. Rama’s younger brother Lákshmana, with a parasol and fly whisk in his hands, boarded the chariot at the rear, standing guard for his brother. As he was departing a wild cheering broke out from the flood of 14.20 people all around. Rághava could hear the comments of the crowd gathered there and the different things the people of the city were saying about him in their deep delight: “There goes Rághava now, on his way to wide sovereignty by the grace of the king. All our wishes have come true, now that we shall have him as our ruler. What a great gain for our people, that at long last this whole kingdom will pass into his hands.” 14.25

Like Váishravana he proceeded on his way, while master musicians sounded his praises, and eulogists, bards and genealogists extolled him as they rode ahead, their horses neighing and elephants trumpeting. The lovely thoroughfare came into Rama’s view, with its teeming elephants, chariots, horses, with the great floods of people overflowing the squares, with its profusion of precious objects and stocks of many wares.

ABOARD HIS CHARIOT in the midst of his delighted supporters, majestic Rama beheld the city crowded with people of every description. Rama proceeded down the center of the royal highway. The splendid thoroughfare was fragrant with aloe-wood and adorned with white, cloudlike houses—gleaming and spacious, flanked with all kinds of wares and foodstuffs of every variety. As he made his way he honored every man, each according to his rank, and heard the many blessings spoken by his supporters: “May you, after your consecration, embark upon and keep to the path travelled by your grandfathers and great-grandfathers.” “Once Rama is king we shall live in even greater happiness 15.1 15.5

Would only that we might see Rama return installed in the kingship.” “There is nothing more welcome to us than this, that Rama, a man of immeasurable power, be consecrated as our king.” Such and others like them were the heartfelt comments of his supporters, and, however laudatory, Rama listened impassively as he proceeded along the thoroughfare. And there was not 15.10 a man among them able to tear his eyes or thoughts away from Rághava, best of men, even when he had left them far behind.

Righteous Rama showed compassion to the people of all four social orders, in a way befitting their ages, and so they were all devoted to him. On reaching the palace that resembled great Indra’s abode, the prince, ablaze with royal splendor, entered his father’s residence. Passing through all the courtyards and turning back all his people, the son of Dasha-ratha came to the private inner chamber. When the prince had gone into his father’s presence, all the people were delighted, and they awaited his return as the ocean, lord of rivers, awaits the rising of the moon.

RAMA SAW HIS FATHER, with a wretched look and his 16.1 mouth all parched, slumped upon his lovely couch, Kaikéyi at his side. First he made an obeisance with all deference at his father’s feet and then did homage most scrupulously at the feet of Kaikéyi. “Rama!” cried the wretched king, his eyes brimming with tears, but he was unable to say anything more or to look at him. As if his foot had grazed a snake, Rama was seized with terror to see the expression on the king's face, one more terrifying than he had ever seen before. For the great king lay heaving sighs, racked with grief and remorse, all his senses numb with anguish, his mind stunned and confused. It was as if the imperturbable, wave-wreathed ocean had suddenly been shaken with perturbation, as if the sun had been eclipsed, or a seer had told a lie. His father's grief was incomprehensible to him, and the more he pondered it, the more his agitation grew, like that of the ocean under a full moon. 16.5

With his father's welfare at heart, Rama struggled to comprehend: "Why does the king not greet me, today of all days? On other occasions, when Father might be angry, the sight of me would calm him. Why, then, when he looked at me just now, did he instead become so troubled? He seems desolate and grief-stricken, and his face has lost its glow." 16.10 Doing obeisance to Kaikéyi, Rama spoke these words: "I have not unknowingly committed some offense, have I, to anger my father? Tell me, and make him forgive me. His face is drained of color, he is desolate and does not speak to me. It cannot be, can it, that some physical illness or mental distress afflicts him? But it is true, well-being is not something one can always keep. Some misfortune has not befallen the handsome prince Bhárata, has it, or courageous Shatrúghna, or one of my mothers?

I should not wish to live an instant if his majesty, the great king, my father, were angered by my failure to satisfy him or do his bidding. How could a man not treat him as a deity incarnate, in whom he must recognize the very source of his existence in this world? Can it be that in anger you 16.15 presumed to use harsh words with my father, and so threw his mind into such turmoil? Answer my questions truthfully, my lady: What has happened to cause this unprecedented change in the lord of men? At the bidding of the king, if enjoined by him, my guru, father, king and benefactor, I would hurl myself into fire, drink deadly poison or drown myself in the sea. Tell me, then, my lady, what the king would have me do. I will do it, I promise. Rama need not say so twice.”

The ignoble Kaikéyi then addressed these ruthless words 16.20 to Rama, the upright and truthful prince: “Long ago, Rághava, in the war of the gods and ásuras, your father bestowed two boons on me, for protecting him when he was wounded in a great battle. By means of these I have demanded of the king that Bhárata be consecrated and that you, Rághava, be sent at once to Dándaka wilderness. If you wish to ensure that your father be true to his word, and you to your own, best of men, then listen to what I have to say. secration and withdraw to Dándaka wilderness, live there seven years and seven, wearing matted hair and bark-cloth garments. Let Bhárata rule this land from the city of the Kósalans, with all the treasures it contains, all its horses, chariots, elephants.”

When Rama, slayer of enemies, heard Kaikéyi’s hateful words, like death itself, he was not the least disconcerted, but only replied: “So be it. I shall go away to live in the forest, wearing matted hair and bark-cloth garments, to safeguard the promise of the king. But I want to know why the lord of earth, the invincible tamer of foes, does not greet me as he used to? You need not worry, my lady. I say it to your face: 16.30

I shall go to the forest—rest assured—wearing bark cloth and matted hair. Enjoined by my father, my benefactor, guru and king, a man who knows what is right to do, what would I hesitate to do in order to please him?

But there is still one thing troubling my mind and eating away at my heart: that the king does not tell me himself that Bhárata is to be consecrated. For my wealth, the kingship, Sita and my own dear life I would gladly give up to my brother Bhárata on my own, without any urging. How much more readily if urged by my father himself, the lord of men, in order to fulfill your fond desire and safeguard his promise? So you must reassure him. Why should the lord of 16.35 earth keep his eyes fixed upon the ground and fitfully shed these tears? This very day let messengers depart on swift horses by order of the king to fetch Bhárata from his uncle's house. As for me, I shall leave here in all haste for Dándaka wilderness, without questioning my father's word, to live there fourteen years."

Kaikéyi was delighted to hear these words of Rama's, and, trusting them implicitly, she pressed Rághava to set out at once. "So be it. Men shall go as messengers on swift horses to bring home Bhárata from his uncle's house. But since you 16.40 are now so eager, Rama, I do not think it wise to linger. You should therefore proceed directly from here to the forest. That the king is ashamed and does not address you himself, that is nothing, best of men, you needn't worry about that. But so long as you have not hastened from the city and gone to the forest, Rama, your father shall neither bathe

Rama raised up the king, pressed though he was by Kai-kéyi—like a horse whipped with a crop—to make haste and depart for the forest. Listening to the ignoble Kaiké- 16.45 yi’s hateful words, so dreadful in their consequences, Rama remained unperturbed and only said to her:

“My lady, it is not in the hopes of gain that I suffer living in this world. You should know that, like the seers, I have but one concern and that is righteousness. Whatever I can do to please this honored man I will do at any cost, even if it means giving up my life. For there is no greater act of righteousness than this: obedience to one’s father and doing as he bids. Even unbidden by this honored man, at your bidding alone I shall live for fourteen years in the desolate forest. Indeed, Kaikéyi, you must ascribe no virtue to me 16.50 at all if you had to appeal to the king, when you yourself are so venerable in my eyes. Let me only take leave of my mother, and settle matters with Sita. Then I shall go, this very day, to the vast forest of the Dándakas. You must see to it that Bhárata obeys Father and guards the kingdom, for that is the eternal way of righteousness.”

When his father heard Rama’s words, he was stricken with such deep sorrow that he could not hold back his sobs in his grief and broke out in loud weeping. Splendid Rama did homage at the feet of his unconscious father and at the feet of that ignoble woman, Kaikéyi; then he turned to leave. Reverently Rama circled his father and Kaikéyi, and, 16.55 withdrawing from the inner chamber, he saw his group of friends. Lákshmana, the delight of Sumíttra, fell in behind him, his eyes brimming with tears, in a towering rage. Reverently circling the equipment for the consecration, but careful not to gaze at it, Rama slowly went away.

The loss of the kingship diminished his great majesty as little as night diminishes the loveliness of the cool-rayed moon, beloved of the world. Though he was on the point of leaving his native land and going to the forest, he was no more discomposed than one who has passed beyond all things of this world. Holding back his sorrow within his mind, keeping his every sense in check and fully self-possessed he made his way to his mother's residence to tell her the sad news. As Rama entered her residence, where joy still reigned supreme, as he reflected on the sudden wreck of all his fortunes, even then he showed no sign of discomposure, for fear it might endanger the lives of those he loved. 16.60

SORELY TROUBLED, HEAVING sighs like an elephant, Rama of his own accord went with his brother to his mother's inner chamber. He observed the venerable elder seated there at the door of the house and many other people standing about. Passing through the first courtyard, he saw the brahmans in the second, old men expert in the Vedas and held in honor by the king. Rama bowed to the old men and passed into the third courtyard, where he saw women old and young vigilantly standing guard at the door. In delight the women congratulated him and then rushed into the house to pass on the news to Rama's mother. 17.1 17.5

Queen Kausálya had spent the night in meditation, and now in the early morning was worshipping Vishnu to secure the welfare of her son. Dressed in linen, intent upon her vow and with deep delight, she was then pouring an oblation into the fire in accordance with the Vedic verses and pronouncing benedictions. Entering her lovely private chamber, Rama saw his mother as she was pouring the oblation into the fire. When she saw that her son, his mother's one joy, had finally come, she approached him in delight, as a mare might her colt. In her deep maternal affection for her son, the invincible Rághava, Kausálya addressed him with these kind and beneficial words: 17.10

“May you attain the life span of the great and aged royal seers who keep to the ways of righteousness. May you attain their fame and the righteousness that benefits a ruling house. See, Rághava, your father is as good as his word. This very day the righteous king will consecrate you as prince regent.”

Extending a little the hands he held cupped in reverence, Rághava bowed low out of natural courtesy and profound respect. Then he said to his mother: “My lady, I see you do not know of the great danger at hand. It will bring sadness to you, Vaidéhi and Lákshmana. For fourteen years I must dwell in the desolate forest, living on honey, fruit and roots, giving up meat like a sage. The great king is awarding Bhárata the office of prince regent and banishing me to Dándaka wilderness and a life of asceticism.” A sorrow such as she had never known swept over her, and Rama saw his mother fall down in a faint, like a broken plantain tree. He came to her side and helped her up, and as she stood there in her desolation, like a mare forced to draw 17.15 a heavy load, he brushed away the dust that covered her whole body. Tortured by such unhappiness as she had never known before, she spoke to Rághava, tiger among men, as he attended on her, with Lákshmana listening:

“Rághava, my son, had you never been born to bring me such grief, had I been childless, I would have been spared any further sorrow. A barren woman’s grief is only of the mind and only a single grief—the painful thought ‘I have no child’; she never comes to feel another, my son. But the joy and comfort I had not found to be within my husband’s power to give me, Rama, I cherished hopes I perhaps might find in a son. How their words will break my heart, the many, painful words I shall hear from those junior co-wives, being their senior as I am. And what could bring a woman greater sorrow? Even with you present this is how I am spurned. What will it be like when you are gone, my child? Surely nothing is left me but to die. For anyone who used to serve me or respect my wishes will look anxiously toward Kaikéyi’s son without so much as a word for me. 17.20 17.25

The ten years and seven since you were born, Rághava, I have passed yearning to put an end to my sorrow. It was so difficult to raise you in my wretched state, and it was all in vain, the meditation and the fasts, and all the pains I took. How hard this heart of mine must be that it does not crumble, as the bank of a great river crumbles in the rains when the fresh waters wash over it. It must be that I can never die, or that no room is left for me in the house of Yama, if even now Death will not carry me off, as brutally as a lion carries off a whimpering doe. my body, too, under this crushing sorrow. How true it is that no one can die before his fated hour. What a sorrowful thing that my vows, my gifts of alms and acts of self-denial have all been to no avail, that the austerities I practiced for my child's sake have proved to be as barren as seed sown in a desert. For if a person broken by heavy sorrow could die before his fated hour, of his own free will, then left without you as I am, like a cow without her calf, I would go this very instant to the congregation of the dead."

When she looked at Rághava and contemplated the great calamity to come, her unhappiness was too much for her to bear, and she broke out in lamentation, as a cow will do at the sight of her calf being bound and dragged away.

LÁKSHMANA GREW DESOLATE while Rama's mother Kausálya made this lamentation and then, in the heat of the moment, he addressed her: "I do not approve of it either, my lady, that Rághava should abdicate the majesty of kingship and go off to the forest, bowing to the demands of a woman. The king is perverse, old and debauched by pleasures. What would he not say under pressure, mad with passion as he is? I know of no crime on Rághava's part nor any fault that could justify his banishment from the kingdom to a life in the forest. I do not know of a single man in this world, not an adversary, nor even an outcast, who would assert such a fault, even behind our backs. Who that has any regard for what is right could renounce, without any provocation, a son so godlike, upright and self-restrained, who cherishes even his enemies? What son, mindful of the conduct of kings, would take to heart the words of a king who has become a child again?

Before anyone learns of this matter, let me help you seize control of the government. With me at your side, bow in hand to protect you, who could prevail against you, Rághava, when you take your stand like Death itself? With my sharp arrows, bull among men, I will empty Ayódhya of men if it stands in opposition. I will slaughter everyone who sides with Bhárata or champions his cause. Leniency always ends in defeat. Now that the king has provoked our implacable enmity, yours and mine, chastiser of foes, what power can he summon to bestow sovereignty on Bhárata? Truly, my lady, the loyalty I feel to my brother comes from the bottom of my heart. I swear it to you by my truth and my bow, by my gifts of alms and sacrifices. Should Rama enter the forest, or a blazing fire, my lady, rest assured that I shall have entered first. I will drive your sorrow away with all the power of the rising sun that drives away the dark. Let the queen behold my power! Let Rághava behold it!" 18.10 18.15

When she heard great Lákshmana's words, Kausálya, weeping and sick with grief, said to Rama: "My son, you have heard your brother Lákshmana speak. Whatever is best to do next you must do, as you see fit. But you must not, heeding the unrighteous words spoken by my co-wife, go away and leave me stricken with grief. You know what is right and if you would do it, my most righteous son, obey me. Stay here and do your supreme duty. Káshyapa obeyed his mother, my son, and lived a life of self-discipline at home. In this way he acquired ultimate ascetic power and reached the highest heaven. In no way am I less deserving 18.20 than the king of the respect you owe a guru. I will not give you permission, you may not go away to the forest. Parted from you what use have I for a life of comfort? Better for me to be with you and eat the grass of the fields. If you go to the forest leaving me sick with grief, I will fast to death right here, for I could not bear to go on living. And you will then be guilty of a crime held in infamy in the world, like the ocean, lord of rivers, who through unrighteous conduct incurred the guilt of brahman-murder.”

So his desolate mother Kausálya lamented, and righteous Rama replied to her in a manner consistent with righteousness: “It is not within my power to defy my father’s bidding. I bow my head in supplication; I wish to go to the forest. Even the wise seer Kandu, a man strict in his observances, slew a cow at the bidding of his father, for he knew that it was right. And in our own family long ago the sons of Ságara, at their father’s command, dug up the earth and thereby met with wholesale slaughter. Rama Jamad-agnya, at his father’s bidding, took an axe and by his own hand butchered his mother Rénuka in the forest. So you see, it is not I alone who acts as his father instructs. I am only following the path sanctioned and taken by those men of old. It is this which is my duty on earth, and I cannot shirk it. Besides, no one who does his father’s bidding ever comes to grief.”

So he spoke to his mother, and then he turned to Lákshmana and said, “I well know, Lákshmana, the profound affection you bear me. But you fail to understand the real meaning of truth and self-restraint. Righteousness is paramount in the world and on righteousness is truth founded.

This command of Father's is based on righteousness and is absolute. Having once heard a father's command, a mother's or a brahman's, one must not disregard it, my mighty brother, if one would hold to what is right. I cannot disobey my father's injunction, mighty brother, and it is at Father's bidding that Kaikéyi has coerced me. So give up this ignoble notion that is based on the code of the kshátriya; be of like mind with me and base your actions on righteousness, not violence." 18.35

So Lákshmana's eldest brother spoke affectionately to his brother. Then, with head bowed and hands cupped in reverence, he once more addressed Kausálya: "Give me your permission, my lady, to go away to the forest. By my very life I adjure you, bestow your blessings on my journey. Once I have fulfilled the promise, I will return to the city from the forest. I cannot for the sake of mere kingship turn my back on glory, whose reward is great; nor, since life is so short, my lady, would I choose today this paltry land against all that is right." The bull among men earnestly pleaded with his mother—he wanted only to go to the Dándakas—and firmly taught his younger brother the proper view of things. Then, in his heart, he reverently circled the woman who gave him birth. 18.40

SAUMÍTRI WAS SHOCKED and desolate; this was all far more than he could bear. He heaved a sigh like a mighty serpent, and his eyes bulged with wrath. But Rama steadfastly maintained his composure and in full self-possession he turned to his beloved friend and brother and spoke: "Saumítri, let this flurry in preparation of my consecration, let it 19.1

all now be directed toward stopping it. You must take care that our mother, to whom my consecration was a source of such heartache, be anxious no more. Not for a moment, 19.5 Saumítri, can I disregard the anxious sorrow that has sprung up in her heart. I do not recall ever doing the slightest thing, intentionally or unintentionally, to displease my mothers or father.

Let my father—a truthful man, true to his word, ever striving for truth—let him be freed from the fears he has of what other people might say. For if this rite were not called off, he too would suffer mental torment, to hear his truthfulness impugned, and his torment would torment me. So call off the consecration ceremony, Lákshmana. As soon as you have done so, I wish to leave the city for the forest. By my immediate banishment the princess will achieve her 19.10 goal, and be able to consecrate her son Bhárata without any hindrance. For only when I have gone into the wilderness, dressed in bark-cloth garments and hides, wearing a crown of matted hair, will Kaikéyi find peace of mind. Since my mind is made up and my heart is set on it, I should not cause more pain. I shall go into banishment without delay.

It is nothing but destiny, Saumítri, that we must see at work in my exile and in the revocation of the kingship, which had been awarded to me. For why should Kaikéyi be so determined to harm me were this intention of hers not fated and ordained by destiny? You know yourself, dear 19.15 brother, that never in the past have I drawn any distinction between our mothers, nor did she ever differentiate between her son and me. I cannot credit anything but fate for those words of hers, those hard and brutal words that meant the revocation of the consecration and my exile. How could she, a princess, so good-natured and virtuous, speak to my harm in the presence of her husband, like the commonest of women? What cannot be explained must surely be fate, which clearly no creature can resist; for how complete the reversal that has befallen her and me.

What man has the power to contest his fate, Saumítri, when one cannot even perceive it except from its effect? Happiness and sadness, fear and anger, gain and loss, birth and death—all things such as these must surely be the effects of fate. I do not feel sad even though my consecration has been thwarted, and neither must you. Comply with my wishes and at once put a stop to the rite of consecration. It is not our younger mother, Lákshmana, who should be blamed for preventing my becoming king. People overmastered by fate say things they never wanted to—you know fate has such power.” 19.20

WHILE RAMA WAS speaking Lákshmana kept his head lowered the whole time and listened with his mind poised, it seemed, midway between joy and sorrow. But then that bull among men knit a frown between his brows and heaved a sigh like a great snake seized with anger in its lair. His frowning face was terrible to see—it looked like the face of a raging lion. He shook his hand as an elephant shakes its trunk, from side to side, up and down, and let his head fall on his chest. Looking askance at his brother, from the corner of his eye, he said, “Now is not the time for panic, the source of this sheer folly. Could a man like you talk this way were he not panicked, fearful of losing people’s respect 20.1 20.5 because of some infraction of righteousness? You are a bull among kshátriya, as powerful as fate is powerless. How in the world can you blame fate, a contemptible, feeble thing?

How is it you harbor no suspicion of those two evil people? Don't you know, my righteous brother, that there are cunning people who wear the guise of righteousness? A thing the whole world would find despicable is under way; someone other than you is to be consecrated. I despise that 'righteousness,' my king, which has so altered your thinking, and about which you are deluded. Even if you think it fate that framed this plot of theirs, still you must reject it. I cannot approve of this course at all. For it is only the weak and cowardly who submit to fate; heroic men, strong of heart, do not humble themselves before fate. A man able to counter fate with manly effort does not give up for all that fate may frustrate his purposes. No, today the people will see the power of fate and the power of man. Today the disparity between the two will be clearly revealed. Today they will see fate checked by my power, just as they saw your royal consecration checked by fate. 20.10

By my power I will turn back fate that is running wild, like a careering elephant beyond control of the goad, in a frenzy of rut and might. Not all the gods who guard the world, Rama, not the entire three worlds—much less our father—could prevent your consecration today. Those who conspired to banish you to the wilderness, your majesty, will themselves be exiled to the wilderness for fourteen years. I shall crush their hopes, Father's and that woman's, of making her son the king by overturning your consecration. The might of fate in aid of one fallen within my mighty grasp 20.15 will be no match for my terrible power and the sorrow it will work. Later on, many years from now, my brother, when 20.20 your sons in turn are protecting the subjects, you can go to live in the forest. For, according to the ways of the royal seers of old, living in the forest is prescribed only after entrusting one's subjects to one's sons, to protect as though they were their very own sons.

If perhaps you are unwilling to assume the kingship without the king's wholehearted support, righteous Rama, for fear of a revolt against your kingship: I swear to you, my heroic brother, may I never come to share in the afterworld of heroes if I do not guard the kingship for you as the shore guards the ocean. With my sword held ready, its blade sharp and lustrous as flashing lightning, I count no one my match, be he Indra himself, god of the thunderbolt. Soon the earth will be impassable, knee-deep in the trunks, flanks and heads of elephants, horses, and men hacked off by the strokes of my sword. those men fancy himself a man? Shooting now one man with many, now many men with one, I will ply my arrows in the vitals of men, horses and elephants. Today the power of my all-powerful weapons shall prevail to strip the king of his power and make it over to you, my lord. Today these arms of mine, well suited for wearing sandalwood cream, sporting bracelets, lavishing wealth and protecting friends as well, will do their job, Rama, repulsing those who stand in the way of your consecration. Just tell me, which of your enemies should I separate this very day from his fame, his loved ones and his life? Just instruct me what to do to bring the land under your control. I am your servant.” 20.35

Wiping Lákshmana’s tears away and comforting him all the while, the heir of the Rághava dynasty said, “You must understand, dear brother, that I am resolved to obey my father’s command, for such is the way of the good.”

WHEN KAUSÁLYA SAW that he was resolved to follow his father’s orders, she said to her most righteous son, through her choking sobs: “How will he who has never known sorrow, who is righteous and speaks kindly to all creatures, how will the son I bore to Dasha-ratha live by gleaning grain? When his servants and slaves are eating delicacies, how can the master eat fruit and roots in the forest? Who would believe it, who would not be seized with terror, to hear that virtuous Rághava, the king’s beloved, is being exiled? If you leave me here, a raging fire of grief, unlike any other, will consume me as the many-colored flames of fire consume 21.1 21.5

When he heard what his mother said in her deep sorrow, Rama, bull among men, addressed her with these words: “Deceived by Kaikéyi, and with me withdrawn to the wilderness, the king will surely not survive if you too should desert him. For a woman to desert her husband is wickedness pure and simple. You must not do so despicable a thing, not even think it. As long as my father and lord of the world, Kakútstha, lives, he must be shown obedience, for that is the eternal way of righteousness.” From these words of Rama’s, Kausálya recognized what was proper. “So be it,” she replied, though without joy, to tireless Rama. 21.10

At this, Rama, champion of righteousness, once more addressed his mother in her deep sorrow: “Both you and I must do as father bids. He is king, husband, foremost guru, lord and master of us all. Once I have passed these nine years and five in the great wilderness, I shall stand again at your bidding, with the deepest joy.” Tormented by his words, 21.15 her face flooded with tears, Kausálya replied to her son, whom she so loved: “Rama, I cannot bear to stay among my co-wives. Take me, too, Kakútstha, to the wilderness like a wild deer if, out of regard for your father, your heart is set on going.”

As she wept like this, Rama wept, too, and said, “So long as she lives, a woman’s one deity and master is her husband. And today the king our master is exercising his mastery over you and me. Bhárata is righteous, too, and speaks kindly to all creatures. He will respect your wishes, for he has always been earnest in doing what is right. When I have departed you must take care to ensure that the king not trouble himself in the least with grief for his son. Even the most excellent of women, one who earnestly undertakes vows and fasts, will come to a bad end if she does not respect her husband's wishes. A woman must show her husband obedience and earnestly strive to please and benefit him. Such is the way of righteousness discovered long ago, revealed in the Veda and handed down in the world. The brahmans likewise, who are true to their vows, you must reverence for my sake, my lady. In this way you will pass the time, awaiting my return. Your fondest wish will be fulfilled when I return, if the champion of righteousness should remain alive.” 21.20

So Rama spoke, and Kausalya, tortured by grief for her son, her eyes dimmed by tears, replied, “Go, my mighty son, and be careful. My blessings with you always.” When the queen saw how determined Rama was to live in the forest, she made her prayers for him from the bottom of her heart and prepared to bestow her blessings on his journey. 21.25

RAMA'S MOTHER RESTRAINED her anguish and took a sip of water. Now pure again and in better spirits, she began to make her prayers for him. “May the sadhyas bless you and the All-Gods, the Maruts and the great seers. May Dhatri and Vidhátri bless you, Pushan, Bhaga and Áryaman, too. May the years and seasons bless you always, the months and half-months, the nights and days and hours. May your way be safe, may your courage prevail, may all good things be plentiful, Rama. Go with my blessings, dear son. May my blessings protect you hour by hour from all the things on earth, in the sky or in heaven that might beset your path. May you have the same good fortune Vínata secured for Supárna, when he went in quest of the nectar." 22.10

Then, of an herb of proven worth, a lucky herb that could ward off thorns, she made an amulet and whispered Vedic verses over it. The glorious woman had him bow his head, she kissed him on the forehead and embraced him, saying, "Go in happiness, Rama my son, and may you achieve success. SO KAUSÁLYA BADE him farewell and Rama did obeisance 23.1
to her, ready to depart for the forest, keeping to the path of righteousness. Along the royal highway crowded with men, the prince went illuminating it and melting the hearts of the people, it seemed, with all his virtues. Poor Vaidéhi had heard nothing of all this; she still believed he was being consecrated as prince regent. She knew the rites for the gods and had performed them in deep delight. Thus she waited for the prince, knowing the kingly attributes to expect. As Rama entered his residence—still decorated 23.5 and thronged with delighted people—he lowered his head a little, in shame.

Sita started up and began to tremble as she looked at her husband consumed with grief, his senses numb with anxious care. When she saw how his face was drained of color, how he sweated and chafed, she was consumed with sorrow.
“What is the meaning of this, my lord?” she asked. Today was surely the day for which the learned brahmins had forecast the conjunction of Pushya, the majestic constellation ruled by Brihas-pati. Why are you so sad, Rághava? The hundred-ribbed parasol with its hue of white-capped water is not throwing its shade upon your handsome face. Your 23.10 face, with eyes like the hundred-petalled lotus, is not fanned by the pair of splendid fly whisks, the color of the moon or the wild goose.

And I see no eloquent panegyrists, bull among men, singing your praises in delight, no bards or genealogists with their auspicious recitation. Nor have the brahmins, masters of the Vedas, sprinkled your head and poured honey and curds upon it, as custom requires. No one wishes to follow

Never before has your face had such color, and I see no sign of delight.” 23.15

Such were her anxious words, and the delight of the Raghus replied to her: “Sita, my honored father is banishing me to the forest. O Jánaki, you are the daughter of a great house, you know what is right and always practice it. Listen to the course of events that has brought this upon me. Once, long ago, when Kaikéyi had found favor with him, my father King Dasha-ratha, a man true to his promise, granted her two great boons. Today, when my consecration was already under way at the instigation of the king, she pressed him for them. Since he had made an agreement, he was compelled by righteousness. For fourteen years I must live in Dándaka, while my father will appoint Bhárata prince regent. I have come to see you before I leave for the desolate forest.” 23.20

You are never to boast of me in the presence of Bhárata. Men in power cannot bear to hear others praised, and so you must never boast of my virtues in front of Bhárata. You must not ever expect to receive any special treatment from him. Life with him will be possible only by constant acquiescence. I will safeguard my guru's promise and leave this very day for the forest. Be strong, my sensible wife. When I have gone to the forest where sages make their home, my precious, blameless wife, you must earnestly undertake vows and fasts. You must rise early and worship the gods according to custom and then pay homage to my father Dasha-ratha, lord of men. And my aged mother Kausálya, who is tormented by misery, deserves your respect as well, for she has subordinated all to righteousness. The rest of my mothers, too, must always receive your homage. My mothers are all equal in my eyes for their love, affection and care. 23.25

And what is most important, you must look on Bhárata and Shatrúghna as your brother and your son, for they are dearer to me than life itself. You must never show opposition to Bhárata, for he is now both king of the country and master of our House. Kings show their favor when they are pleased with good conduct and sedulously attended to—and if they are not, they grow angry. Lords of men will repudiate their sons, their own flesh and blood, if they serve them ill, and will adopt even strangers, should they prove capable. My beloved, I am going to the great forest, and you must stay here. You must do as I tell you, my lovely, and not give offense to anyone.” 23.30

O Rama, bestower of honor, you have the power to protect any other person in the forest. Why then not me? You need not doubt that I can survive on nothing but fruit and roots; I shall not cause you any trouble by living with you. I want to see the streams and mountains, the ponds and forests, and nowhere shall I be afraid with my wise husband to defend me. I want to see the lotus ponds in full bloom, blanketed with geese and ducks, happy in your company, my mighty husband. What pleasures I shall share with you, my large-eyed husband, what bliss for me to be with you like this, were it for a hundred thousand years! If I were to be offered a place to live in heaven itself, Rághava, tiger among men, I would refuse it if you were not there. I will go to the trackless forest teeming with deer, monkeys and elephants, and live there as if in my father's house, clinging to your feet alone, in strict self-discipline. I love no one else; my heart is so attached to you that were we to be parted I am resolved to die. Take me, oh please grant my request. I shall not be a burden to you.” 24.15

Despite what Sita said, the best of men, who so cherished righteousness, was still unwilling to take her, and in order to dissuade her he began to describe how painful life in the forest is.

WHEN SITA FINISHED speaking, the righteous prince, who knew what was right and cherished it, attempted to dissuade her. “Sita, you are the daughter of a great house and have always been earnest in doing what is right. You must stay here and do your duty, not what your heart desires. My frail Sita, you must do as I say. There are so many 25.1

hardships in the forest. Listen to me and I shall tell you. Sita, give up this notion of living in the forest. The name 'forest' is given only to wild regions where hardships abound. It is, 25.5 in fact, with your welfare at heart that I am saying this. The forest is never a place of pleasure—I know—but only of pain. There are lions that live in mountain caves; their roars are redoubled by mountain torrents and are a painful thing to hear—the forest is a place of pain. At night, worn with fatigue, one must sleep upon the ground on a bed of leaves, broken off of themselves—the forest is a place of utter pain.

And one has to fast, Máithili, to the limit of one's endurance, wear clothes of bark cloth and bear the burden of matted hair. The wind is so intense there and the darkness, too. One is always hungry and the dangers are so great—the forest is a place of utter pain. There are many creeping 25.10 creatures, of every size and shape, my lovely, ranging aggressively over the ground—the forest is a place of utter pain. There are snakes, too, that live in the rivers, moving as sinuously as rivers, and they are always there obstructing one's way—the forest is a place of utter pain. Moths, scorpions, worms, gnats and flies continually harass one, my frail Sita—the forest is wholly a place of pain. There are thorn trees, kusha and kasha grass, my lovely, and the forest is a tangle of their branches and blades—the forest is a place of utter pain. So no more of your going to the forest, you could not bear it. The more I think about it the more I see how many hardships the forest holds."

When great Rama had thus made up his mind not to take her to the forest, Sita did not reply to him at once, but then in bitter sorrow she spoke. 25.15

S WAS OVERCOME with sorrow when she heard what Rama said. With tears trickling down her face, she answered him in a faint voice. “Do you not know that what you call the hardships of life in the forest would all be luxuries if your love accompanied them? By the order of our elders I must go with you, Rama. I would die here and now if parted from you. But if I were by your side, Rághava, not even Shakra, lord of the gods, could harm me for all his might. A woman whose husband has left her cannot go on living, regardless of what advice you give me, Rama. Besides, my wise husband, long ago in my father’s house I heard the brahmans prophesy that some day I should have to live in the forest. The twice-born could read the marks on a person’s body, my powerful husband, and from that moment at home, when I heard what they foretold, I have constantly yearned to live in the forest. 25.5

The prediction that I should have to live in the forest must some day be fulfilled. And it is with you that I would go there, my love, not otherwise. I will go with you and carry out the prediction. The moment has arrived; let the prophecy of the twice-born come true. I know that in living in the forest there is indeed much pain, my mighty husband, but it is only those who are unprepared that suffer from it. When I was a girl in my father’s house I happened to hear, in the presence of my mother, all about forest life from a holy mendicant woman. And, in fact, I have begged you many 26.10 times before to let us go and live together in the forest, my lord, so much do I desire it.

Please, Rághava, I have been waiting for the chance to go. I want nothing more than to serve my hero as he lives in the forest. If from feelings of love I follow you, my pure-hearted husband, I shall have no sin to answer for, because my husband is my deity. My union with you is sacred and shall last even beyond death. There is a holy scripture, my high-minded husband, that glorious brahmans recite: 'When in this world, in accordance with their own customs and by means of the ritual waters, a woman's father gives her to a man, she remains his even in death.' What then is the reason you are set against taking me away from here, your own wife, a woman of good conduct and faithful to her husband? I am devoted and faithful to my husband. I have always shared your joy and sorrow, and now I am so desolate. You must take me, Kakútstha: your joy has always been mine to share, and your sorrow. If you refuse to take me to the forest despite the sorrow that I feel, I shall have no recourse but to end my life by poison, fire or water." 26.15

Though she pleaded with him in this and every other way to be allowed to go, great-armed Rama would not consent to taking her to the desolate forest. And when he told her as much, Máithili fell to brooding, and drenched the ground, it seemed, with the hot tears that fell from her eyes. And as Vaidéhi brooded, wondering how to change his mind, anger took hold of her. But Kakútstha did not lose his self-composure and tried his best to appease her. 26.20

 Jánaka, addressed her husband once more in the hope of living in the forest. Sita was deeply distraught, and out of love and indignation she began to revile broad-chested Rághava.

“What could my father Vaidéha, the lord of Míthila, have had in mind when he took you for a son-in-law, Rama, a woman with the body of a man? How the people lie in their ignorance. Rama’s ‘great power’ is not at all like the power 27.5 of the blazing sun that brings the day. On what grounds are you so reluctant, what are you afraid of that you are ready to desert me, who has no other refuge? Do you not know, my mighty husband, that I bow to your will, that I am as faithful to you as Sávitrí was to Satyavánt, Dyu-mat-sena’s son? Were I to go with you, blameless Rághava, I would not even think of looking at any man but you, unlike some women who disgrace their family. But like a procurer, Rama, you are willing of your own accord to hand me over to others—your wife, who came to you a virgin and who has been a good woman all the long while she has lived with you. You must not leave for the forest without taking me.
 Let it be austerities, or the wilderness, or heaven, but let it be with you.

As I follow behind you I shall no more tire on the path 27.10 than on our pleasure beds. The kusha and kasha grass, the reeds, the rushes and thorn trees will feel just like cotton or a pelt to me on the road with you. The dust raised by heavy winds that will settle on me, my love, I shall look upon as the costliest sandalwood cream. As I roam through the deep forest there will be meadows for me to rest in, and to rest on

There will be fruits and flowers in their seasons to enjoy, and I shall not think with longing of my mother or father or home. And when you are there you will not know any grief or displeasure on my account. I shall not be a burden. 27.15

To be with you is heaven, to be without you hell. Knowing how deep my love is, Rama, you must take me when you go. But if you will not let me go to the forest when I am so set on it, I will take poison this very day, sooner than come under the sway of those who hate us. Afterward I could not live anyway, my lord, for the sorrow of being deserted by you. Better to die that very instant. I could not bear the grief of it even for a moment, much less ten years of sorrow, and three, and one." 27.20

Consumed with grief, she lamented long and piteously. Crying out in anguish, she shrieked and embraced her husband with all her might. His many words had wounded her, the way poison arrows wound a cow elephant. And the tears she had held in so long burst forth like a flame from a kindling stick. Water clear as crystal, springing from her torment, came gushing from all around her eyes, like water from two lotuses. She was nearly insensible with sorrow when Rama took her in his arms and comforted her with these words:

“If its price were your sorrow, my lady, I would refuse 27.25 heaven itself. No, I am not afraid of anything, any more than is the Self-existent Brahma. But without knowing your true feelings, my lovely, I could not consent to your living in the wilderness, though I am perfectly capable of protecting you.
 Since you are determined to live with me in the forest, Máithili, I could no sooner abandon you than a self-respecting man his reputation. But it is righteousness, my smooth-limbed wife, the righteousness good men in the past have practiced, that I am set on following today, as its radiance follows the sun. And righteousness is this, my fair-hipped wife: submission to one’s mother and father. I could not bear to live were I to disobey their command. My father 27.30 keeps to the path of righteousness and truth, and I wish to act just as he instructs me. That is the eternal way of righteousness. Follow me, my timid one, be my companion in righteousness. Go now and bestow precious objects on the brahmins, give food to the mendicants and all who ask for it. Hurry, there is no time to waste.”

Finding that her husband had acquiesced in her going, the lady was elated and set out at once to make the donations. Glorious Sita was delighted, her every wish fulfilled by what her husband said, and in high spirits the woman set off to give money and precious objects to all who upheld righteousness.

MIGHTY RAMA THEN turned to Lákshmana, who came 28.1 and stood before him, hands cupped in reverence, begging that he might be allowed to go, in the very lead. “Saumítri, were you to go with me now to the forest, who would support Kausálya and glorious Sumitra? The mighty lord of the land, who used to shower them with all they desired, as a rain cloud showers the earth, is now caught up in the snare of desire. And once the daughter of King Ashva-pati gains control of the kingdom, she will not show any good will to her co-wives in their sorrow.”

So Rama eloquently spoke, and Lákshmana in a gen- 28.5
tle voice replied to him with equal eloquence: “Your own power, my mighty brother, will no doubt ensure that Bhárata scrupulously honors Kausálya and Sumitra. The noble Kausálya could support a thousand men like me, for she has acquired a thousand villages as her living. I will take my bow and arrows and bear the spade and basket. I will go in front of you, leading the way. I will always be there to bring you roots and fruit and such other produce of the forest as is proper fare for ascetics. You shall take your pleasure with 28.10 Vaidéhi on the mountain slopes while I do everything for you, when you are awake and when you sleep.”

His words pleased Rama, and he replied, “Go, Saumítri, and take leave of all your friends. And those two divine, awesome-looking bows that great Váruna himself bestowed on Jánaka at the grand sacrifice; the two suits of divine, residence. Collect the arms, Lákshmana, and come back at once.”

So, resolved to live in the forest, he bade farewell to his friends and to the guru of the Ikshvákus, and gathered up the all-powerful arms. Saumítri, tiger of the Raghus, displayed to Rama all the divine arms, in perfect order still and adorned with garlands. When Lákshmana had come back, Rama, joyfully and with full self-possession, said to him, “You have come, dear Lákshmana, at the very moment I desired. I want your help, slayer of enemies, in giving away whatever wealth I possess to the poor brahmans, to the best of the twice-born who live here in firm devotion to my gurus, and in particular to all my dependents. Fetch at once the foremost of the twice-born, noble Suyájña, Vasíshtha’s son. I will leave for the forest after paying homage to him and all the other twice-born men of learning.”

order, he left and immediately entered Suyájña's house.
The priest was in the fire-sanctuary, and after greeting him Lákshmana said, "My friend, come visit the dwelling of the man who is doing what no man has ever done." After performing the twilight worship he left straightaway with Saumítri and entered Rama's lovely, majestic house.

On the arrival of Suyájña, the master of the Vedas who shone like a fire ablaze with the offering, Rághava and Sita cupped their hands in reverence and approached him.
Kakútstha honored Suyájña with gifts—magnificent arm- 29.5 bands fashioned of gold, sparkling earrings, gems strung on golden chains, bracelets and wristbands, and many other precious objects. And then, at Sita's urging, Rama said to him: "Take this necklace and golden chain to your wife, my dear friend. Here is a jewelled belt, too, which Sita wishes to give you. She also wishes to bestow on you this couch with exquisite coverlets, adorned with a variety of gems. I have an elephant named Shatruñ-jaya, given to me by my maternal uncle and worth a thousand others. I make you a gift of him, bull among the twice-born."

So Rama spoke, and Suyájña accepted all the gifts and 29.10 conferred gracious blessings on Rama, Lákshmana and Sita.
As Brahma might address Indra, lord of the thirty gods, Rama then addressed his kind, attentive brother Saumítri with these kind words: "Summon the two eminent brah- mans Agástya and Káushika and in homage shower precious objects on them, Saumítri, as crops are showered with Present a thousand draft animals, two hundred oxen and a thousand cows, Saumítri, to provide for dairy needs."

Then Lákshmana himself, tiger among men, gave the riches as ordered to the lordly brahmans, just as Kubéra, giver of riches, might have done. Now, after Rama had bestowed great wealth on each and every one of his dependents, he spoke to them as they stood before him choked with tears. "Both Lákshmana's dwelling and the house be- 29.20 longing to me may be occupied until I return." After speaking with all his sorrowful dependents, he turned to the keeper of the treasury and said, "Have the treasure brought." His dependents then fetched all his treasure. And the tiger among men, with Lákshmana's help, had the treasure distributed to the needy brahmans, young and old alike.

There came a sallow brahman then, by the name of Tri-jata Gargya, all the way up to the fifth courtyard without anyone stopping him. Reaching the prince, Tri-jata said, "Glorious prince, I am penniless and have many children. I must live by constant gleanings in the forest. Have regard for me." Rama replied to him jokingly, "There are one thousand cows I have not yet allocated. You shall have as many as 29.25 you can cover by hurling your staff." In a frantic rush he girded up the rag around his loins and, brandishing his staff impetuously, hurled it with every ounce of his strength. Rama then said to Gargya, seeking to placate him, "You

NOW, AFTER THE two Rághavas and Vaidéhi had bestowed vast wealth upon the brahmans, they went to see their father. How brilliant they looked when they took up their formidable weapons, which Sita had ornamented and hung with flower garlands. The wealthy townspeople went up to the roofs of their palaces and mansions and to the tops of many-storied buildings and watched despondently. The streets were so thronged with people as to be impassable, and so they went up to the roofs of their palaces and in desolation gazed down at Rághava. When the people saw Rama going on foot and without the royal parasol, their hearts were crushed with grief, and they said many different things: 30.1 29.5

“The prince, whom a vast army of four divisions used to follow as he went forth, is all alone now, with only Lákshmana and Sita to follow behind.” “Though he has known the taste of kingly power and has always met the needs of the needy, in his veneration for righteousness he refuses to let his father break his word.” “People on the royal highway can now look at Sita, a woman whom even creatures of the sky have never had a glimpse of before.” “Sita is used to cosmetics and partial to red sandalwood cream, but the rain and the heat and the cold will soon ruin her complexion.”

“Surely it is some spirit that has possessed Dasha·ratha and 30.10

spoken today, for the king could never bring himself to exile his beloved son." "How could a man force his own son into exile, even an unvirtuous son, let alone one who has vanquished the world simply by his good conduct?" "Benevolence, compassion, learning, good character, restraint and equanimity—these are the six virtues that adorn Rághava, the best of men."

"And so the people are sorely hurt by any injury to him, like water creatures when the water dries up in the summertime." "When the lord of the world is hurt so is all the world, as the fruit and flowers of a tree are hurt by an injury to its root." "Let us at once take our wives and kinsmen, and like Lákshmana follow Rághava as he goes forth, wherever he may go." "Let us abandon our gardens, our fields and homes, and follow righteous Rama, to share his sorrow and joy." "Let us unearth our buried treasure, remove our stores of grain and our wealth, and take all our valuables. And when the household gods have abandoned them, and their courtyards are falling into disrepair and the dust settling thick upon them, let Kaikéyi take possession of the dwellings we have left." "Let all the animals leave their haunts, the snakes their lairs, the birds and beasts their mountain slopes, and take possession of what we have left." 30.15 30.20

Such were the kinds of remarks people were making one after the other, and Rama heard them, but for all that he heard his mind remained unmoved. And even when Rama looked at the people in their anguish, not the least anguish touched him—he was smiling instead as he walked on, eager to see his father, eager to carry out his father's order to the letter. Rama, the great son of Aikshváka, on the point of leaving for the forest, caught sight of the anguished Sumántra, and only then did he come to a halt, in order to gain admittance to his father. Because he so cherished righteousness, Rághava had his mind firmly made up to enter the forest on his father's order. With a glance at Sumántra, he said, "Announce my arrival to the king."

numb with misery, entered at once. He saw the lord of men heaving sighs. The wise charioteer gazed at him grieving over Rama in deep mental turmoil. He then approached with hands cupped in reverence. "Tiger among men, your son is here waiting at the door. He has given away all his wealth to brahmans and his dependents. Let Rama, who always strives for truth, come and see you, please. He has taken leave of all his friends and now wishes to see you. He 30.5 is about to depart for the great forest. Lord of the world, grant him audience, a man whom all kingly virtues encircle as beams encircle the sun."

The truthful and righteous lord of men, like the ocean in profundity and as free from taint as the sky, replied: "Sumántra, bring all my wives to me. I wish to see Rághava in the company of all my wives." He went straight into the inner chamber and said to the women, "The king your husband summons you. Go to him at once." So Sumántra spoke by order of the king, and all the women proceeded to their husband's chamber in compliance with his command.

Half seven hundred ladies with coppery eyes, who held firm 31.10 to their vows, gathered around Kausálya and slowly made their way. When the king and lord of the land observed that his wives had come, he said to the charioteer, "Sumán-tra, now bring my son." Then, with Rama, Lákshmana, and Máithili, the charioteer at once came forward into the presence of the lord of the world.

Seeing his son at a distance approaching with hands cupped in reverence, the tormented king in the midst of his womenfolk started up suddenly from his throne. At the sight of Rama the lord of the peoples ran impetuously forward but, broken by sorrow, he fell to the ground in a faint 31.15 before he reached him. Rama flew to him at once and so did Lákshmana, the great chariot-fighter, as the lord of men lay insensible with sorrow and lost in grief. And suddenly a shrill screaming broke out in the king's chamber, as countless women cried, "Alas, alas for Rama!" the cry made all the louder by the noise of their jewelry. Rama and Láksh-mana both took him in their arms and with Sita's help they laid him on a couch, all three of them in tears.

After a moment the lord of the land, overwhelmed by a sea of grief, regained consciousness. Then Rama cupped his hands in reverence and said to him: "I ask leave of you, your majesty, for you are lord of us all. I am about to set out for Dándaka wilderness. Look kindly on me. Give leave 31.20 to Lákshmana. Sita, too, shall follow me to the forest. Neither of them would be dissuaded despite the many sound arguments I offered. Have done with grieving, bestower of honor, and give leave to us all, to Lákshmana, Sita, and me, as Praja-pati once gave his children leave." Rághava waited intently for the lord of the world to grant him permission to live in the forest. The king looked at him and said, “Rághava, I was deceived by Kaikéyi into granting a boon. Depose me now and become king of Ayódhya yourself.”

So the lord of men, his father, spoke, and Rama, champion of righteousness, cupped his hands in reverence and in full command of his words replied to him: “You shall be lord of earth, your majesty, for countless years to come, and I will live in the wilderness. You must not on my account act untruthfully. After I have passed the nine years and five of life in the forest, I shall once again clasp your feet, lord of men, when the promise is fulfilled.” The king wept in anguish at the snare of truth in which he was caught. But under silent pressure from Kaikéyi, he said at last to his beloved son: “Go in safety, my dear son, and may no harm befall you. May your way be safe and free from all dangers, and lead you to good fortune, prosperity and home once more. But by no means must you go now, this evening, my son. Spend the night in the company of your mother and me. Tomorrow morning, with all your desires satisfied, you may set out.” 31.25

When Rama heard the words of his anguished father, he was desolate, and so was his brother Lákshmana. He said: “Who will confer on me tomorrow the benefits I should have tonight? I prefer, to any objects of desire, merely to depart. I abdicate all claim to this treasure-laden earth, its kingdom and people, its stores of grain and wealth. Let it be made over to Bhárata. or comfort or even Máithili that I desire, but that you be truthful, bull among men, not false. The city, the kingdom, and the entire land I abdicate. Let it all be given to Bhárata. I will follow your command and leave for my long stay in the forest.

Let Bhárata hold absolute rule over the land I abdicate—this kindly land with its firm boundaries, its mountain ranges, towns and woodlands. Let it be as you have said, my king. Never to the same degree have I set my heart on great objects of desire or my own pleasure, your majesty, as 31.35 on your command, which men of learning always endorse. Put an end to your sorrow on my account, my blameless father. If it meant entangling you in falsehood, my blameless father, I would reject sovereign kingship, reject all objects of desire, all comforts, Máithili, life itself. The truth of your vow must be preserved. There will be fruit and roots in the forest for me to eat, mountains, rivers and lakes to see, and the moment I find myself among the many-colored trees I shall be happy. You should feel joy as well.”

and tearful sigh, and then in an urgent voice he said to Sumántra: “Charioteer, I want an army, a force of four divisions, to be provisioned with every luxury and marshalled at once as escort for Rághava. Let there be eminent courtesans to adorn the prince’s retinue and prosperous merchants with choice wares to display. Handsomely pay all his dependents and all whose acts of strength have pleased him and assign them to his suite as well. Killing deer and elephants, 32.5 drinking forest liquor and viewing the different rivers he will not think with longing of the kingdom. The entire contents of my granary and treasury are to go with Rama while he lives in the desolate forest. His life in the forest will be pleasant, what with holding sacrifices at holy places, conferring fitting priestly stipends and consorting with seers. Great-armed Bhárata shall protect Ayódhya. Let majestic Rama be sent off with every object of desire.”

While Kakútstha was speaking, Kaikéyi was gripped by fear. Her mouth went dry and her voice was choked. Pale 32.10 and frightened, Kaikéyi spoke out: “My good man, Bhárata is not to take charge of a kingdom stripped of its wealth, like a cup of wine drained to the dregs, an empty kingdom without a single thing to whet his appetite!” So Kaikéyi viciously spoke, abandoning all shame, and King Dasha-ratha answered his large-eyed wife: “Will you yoke me to a burden, malicious woman, and beat me even as I bear it?” Kaikéyi’s fury was redoubled. “It was in your House,” she said to the king, “that Ságara dispossessed his eldest son—Asamánja was his name. This one must leave in the same way.” “Curse you!” was all King Dasha-ratha could say in reply. And though the people were all ashamed for her, she paid them no mind.

Then an aged minister named Siddhártha, an honest man esteemed by the king, addressed Kaikéyi: “But Asamánja 32.15 was wicked. He took pleasure in seizing children playing on the road and then hurling them into the waters of the Sárayu. When the townsmen saw what he was doing they were all enraged and told the king, ‘Increaser of the realm, you must choose one: either Asamánja or us.’ The king asked, ‘What has happened to cause this fear of yours?’, and the citizens responded to the king’s inquiry: ‘When our little children are out playing, this madman hurls them into the Sárayu and enjoys it to no end in his insanity.’ When he heard what the people said, the lord of men renounced his malevolent son in his desire to please them. It was thus 32.20 righteous King Ságara renounced him. But what evil has Rama done that he should be dispossessed like that?”

After listening to Siddhártha’s speech, the king, in a failing voice and words fraught with grief, said to Kaikéyi: “I will accompany Rama today, renouncing altogether the kingdom, pleasure and wealth. And with King Bhárata may you long enjoy the kingdom to your heart’s content.”

AFTER LISTENING TO the minister’s speech, Rama addressed Dasha-ratha with the deference in which he was practiced. “I have given up pleasures, your majesty, and shall live in the wilderness on things of the wild. I have 33.1 given up all attachments; what use then have I of an escort? Would a man who gives away a prize elephant cling to the cinch-belt? Why cherish the rope once the animal is gone? So it is for me, too, best of men and lord of the world. What use have I for a bannered army? I must refuse it all.

Let them bring me only bark-cloth garments. Bring me a small basket, too, and a spade before I go to the forest to make my dwelling for fourteen years.” 33.5

Kaikéyi herself then brought the bark-cloth garments. “Put them on!” she said to Rághava, unembarrassed before the crowd of people. The tiger among men took a pair of them from Kaikéyi, and, laying his delicate clothes aside, he dressed himself in the clothes of a sage. Lákshmana too, then and there, removed his lovely clothing and put on the garb of an ascetic, in the presence of his father.

Then Sita, who was dressed in silks, glanced at the bark-cloth garment meant for her to wear, and she was frightened, like a spotted doe at the sight of a trap. Disconcerted and embarrassed, she took it up. Then she said to her husband, the very image of the king of gandhárvas, “How do the sages who live in the forest put on bark cloth?” She picked one up in her hand and held it to her neck and stood there, the daughter of Jánaka, awkward and ashamed. At once Rama, champion of righteousness, came up to her and with his own hands fastened it over Sita’s silks. Dressed in bark cloth she stood there as if defenseless, though her defender was at her side, while the people all cried out, “A curse upon you, Dasha-ratha!” Aikshváka heaved a burning sigh as he said to his wife, “Kaikéyi, Sita must not go in garments of bark and kusha grass. Surely it suffices you, evil creature, that Rama is being exiled. Must you heap these vile crimes on top of that?” 33.10 33.15

With this, the king hung his head and sat still, and Rama addressed him once more before leaving for the forest: “Righteous father, Kausálya here, my glorious mother, is an aged woman of noble character, and she does not reproach you, my lord. She has never known adversity before, and bereft of me she will be plunged into a sea of grief. Show her higher regard, please, granter of boons. Equal of great Indra, this mother of mine dotes on her child. Please, take care that she not be tortured with grief when I am in the forest, that she does not lay down her life and go her way to the house of Yama, god of death.”

clothes of a sage, the king, along with all his wives, was stricken senseless. He was so broken by sorrow he could not look at Rághava, so sick at heart he could not address him to his face. The great-armed lord of the land fell unconscious for a moment and then in sorrow he began to lament, thinking only of Rama: “It must be, I guess, that in the past I injured many living things or made many childless; that 34.5 must be why such a thing has happened to me. Before one’s fated hour has come life cannot slip from the body, for Kaikéyi has tortured me and still I am not dead—I who see before me my own son, brilliant as fire, taking off his delicate garments and dressing in the clothes of an ascetic. The people, too, are tortured, and all because one woman, Kaikéyi, resorted to this deception in the pursuit of her own ends.” So he spoke, his eyes dimmed by tears. Then he cried out “Rama!” only once, and could speak no further.

When after a moment he regained his senses, the lord of the land, his eyes filled with tears, said to Sumántra: “Harness the finest horses to a draft-chariot and return; 34.10 you must convey my illustrious son out of this country. Such, I guess, must be the reward the virtuous earn by their virtues, if this good and heroic prince is exiled to the forest by his mother and his father.”

Acknowledging the king’s command, Sumántra left at a quick pace. He harnessed the horses to the decorated chariot and then returned to the chamber. Cupping his hands in reverence, the charioteer informed the prince that the chariot was standing ready, ornamented with gold and harnessed with excellent horses. The king hurriedly summoned the officer in charge of the treasury. He was a meticulous and altogether honest man, with an accurate knowledge of times and places. “Go at once,” he told him, “and fetch 34.15 precious garments and choice ornaments for Vaidéhi, calculating against the number of years.” Thus addressed by the lord of men, he went at once to the treasure-room and brought everything and presented it to Sita.

Noble Vaidéhi, on the point of leaving for the forest, adorned her noble limbs with the sparkling jewelry. And in her rich adornment, Vaidéhi shed a deep luster over the chamber—it was like daybreak when the radiant sun comes up and sheds its splendor over the sky. Her mother-in-law took Máithili in her arms and kissed her on the forehead, and then said to the virtuous princess: “If a woman who has 34.20 been constantly gratified with things to please her does not hold her husband in respect when he has fallen low, she is regarded as a bad woman in the eyes of all the world. must not feel disdain for my son in his banishment. He is your deity, whether he be rich or poor."

Sita knew her words were in harmony with what was right and good and, with hands cupped in reverence, she faced her mother-in-law and replied: "I will act exactly as my noble lady instructs me. I fully understand how to behave toward my husband; I have learned well. My lady ought not to liken me to bad people. I could no more leave the path of righteousness than radiance can leave the moon. Without strings a lute cannot be played, without wheels a chariot cannot move, and without her husband a woman finds no happiness, though she have a hundred sons. There is a limit to what a father can give, a limit to what a mother or son can give, but a husband gives without any limit. What wife would not revere him? I for my part understand this; I am a high-born woman who has learned right from wrong. My lady, how could I be disdainful? A husband is a woman's deity." 34.25

As Kausálya listened to Sita, the words touched the good woman's heart, and she suddenly burst out in tears of joy and sorrow. Then Rama, who understood best of all the meaning of righteousness, cupped his hands in reverence and approached his mother where she stood in the place of honor among the others. And he said to her:

"Do not be sorrowful, mother. Have regard for my father. My stay in the forest will soon be over. The nine years and five will pass for you like a night's sleep, and you will see me come home safe and sound, in the company of my loved ones." These few sensible words were all he said to the woman who bore him. Then he turned his gaze and 34.30 looked at his other three hundred and fifty mothers. They were just as deeply anguished, and, with hands cupped in reverence, the son of Dasha-ratha addressed them with these righteous words: “If in our living together I ever showed you any rudeness, however unwittingly, please forgive me for it. I bid you all farewell.”

As Rághava spoke these words, a scream broke out like the crying of curlews, from the wives of the lord of men. The palace of Dasha-ratha, where once tambourines and bass drums rumbled like storm clouds, was now filled with lamentation and wailing, so bitter was the sorrow of this calamity. 34-35

IN DESOLATION RAMA, Sita and Lákshmana clasped the feet of the king. Then, cupping their hands, they reverently circled him. After taking leave of him, Sita and righteous Rághava, distraught with grief, did obeisance to his mother. Directly after his brother, Lákshmana did obeisance to Kausálya and then clasped the feet of his own mother, Sumitra. As great-armed Lákshmana Saumítri paid reverence to his mother, she wept and kissed him on the forehead, and with his welfare at heart she said to him: “You are determined to live in the forest out of deep loyalty to your loved ones. Do not be inattentive, my son, when your brother Rama is on his way. He is your one refuge in times of both adversity and prosperity, my blameless son. The way of righteousness good people follow in the world is just this: submission to the will of one’s elders. Remember, too, the conduct that has been the age-old custom of this House: liberality, consecration for sacrifice, and readiness to give up one’s life 35-5 in battle. Look upon Rama as Dasha-ratha, look upon Jánaka's daughter as me, look upon the woods as Ayódhya. Go in happiness, my dear son."

Then Sumántra, hands cupped in reverence and with the deference in which he was practiced, addressed Kakútstha as Mátali might address Vásava: "Be pleased to mount the chariot, glorious prince. I will at once convey you wherever you tell me, Rama. For you must now commence the fourteen years of life in the forest, which the queen has forced upon you." 35.10

When fair-hipped Sita had finished ornamenting herself, with a cheerful heart she boarded the chariot that stood gleaming like the sun. Sumántra placed inside the chariot-box the brothers' collection of weapons, their armor and the leather basket, and when he saw they both had boarded with Sita, he briskly urged on the superb horses, in speed like the rushing wind.

As Rághava set out for his long stay in the great wilderness, a wave of stupor passed through the city, overwhelming the army and the people. There was turmoil and confusion in the town, the elephants became wild and unruly, and the horses clanged noisily. The town was in utter agony. The people—young and old alike—began to run straight toward Rama, as men tormented by summer's heat run toward water. Clinging to the sides and the back, they raised their tearful faces and in their bitter sorrow they all cried out: "Charioteer, draw in the horses' reins, go slowly, slowly! Let us look upon Rama's face, for soon it will be lost to our sight. Surely the heart of Rama's mother must be made of iron if it does not break though her godlike 35.15 35.20 child is going off to the forest. Vaidéhi has accomplished her purpose—she follows her lord like a shadow, earnest in doing what is right, and can no more leave him than sunlight can leave Mount Meru. Ah, Lákshmana, you have achieved your goal; you will have the chance to serve your kind-spoken, godlike brother all the while. This is a great achievement for you, a great blessing, the way to heaven, that you are following after him.” As they said these things their tears welled up and they could not hold them back.

Then in his desolation the king, accompanied by his desolate wives, emerged from the palace exclaiming, “Let me see my beloved son!” Before him could be heard a mighty 35.25 din of women crying, like the wailing of cow elephants when their great bull is captured. And his father, majestic King Kakútstha, looked as feeble as the full, hare-marked moon dimmed at the hour of eclipse. Then, behind Rama, a tumultuous clamor broke out among the men as they saw the king collapsing under his heavy sorrow. “Oh Rama!” some of the people wailed, and others, “Oh mother of Rama!” while all the women of the inner chamber lamented over the crying king.

Rama glanced back and saw his mother trailing behind and the king, too, dazed and wretched. But he was caught up in the bonds of righteousness and dared not gaze at them openly. They were on foot who should have ridden, who 35.30 had known only comfort and did not deserve such suffering. And when he saw them he exhorted the charioteer, crying out, “Go faster!” For the tiger among men could not bear the heart-rending sight of his father and mother; it was like a goad tormenting an elephant. Kausályá ran weeping after the chariot, crying "Rama, Rama! Oh Sita, Lákshmana!" He glanced back often at his mother, who seemed almost to be dancing. With the king crying, "Stop!" and Rághava, "Go on! Keep going!," Sumántra's very soul seemed caught between two wheels. "You can tell the king you did not hear, if he should rebuke you," Rama said to him. "To prolong sorrow is the worst thing of all." He did as Rama told him, 35.35 and taking leave of the people, the charioteer urged on the already racing horses.

After they had reverently circled Rama, the king's people did turn back, but their hearts did not, nor the rush of their tears. To the great king Dasha-ratha his ministers then said, "A person one hopes to see returning should not be followed out too far." The king listened to what they said and, despondent and wretched, his body bathed in sweat, he halted with his wives and gazed out after his perfect son.

WHEN, with hands cupped in reverence, the tiger among 36.1 men was departing, a loud cry of anguish broke out from the women of the inner chamber. "Where can our defender be going, he who was the recourse and refuge of this weak, defenseless and miserable people? He never grows angry, whatever the insult, he avoids giving cause for anger, he calms the angry and shares every sorrow—where is he going? The mighty prince who treats us as he treats his own mother Kausálya—where can the great man be going? Kai- 36.5 káyí hounded the king until he drove him into the forest. loved by every living soul on earth.” So all the queens, like cows who have lost their calves, wept in the torment of their sorrow, and shrilly wailed.

Already inflamed with grief for his son, the lord of the land grew more sorrowful, still hearing the dreadful cry of anguish from the women of the inner chamber. No fire offerings were offered, and the sun vanished. Elephants let their fodder drop, cows would not suckle their calves. The constellation Tri-shanku, the planets Lohitángá, Brihas-pati and Budha, too, all took ominous positions over the moon. The stars lost their radiance, the planets lost their glow, and the constellation Vishákha shone, clouded by smoke, in the sky. A wave of despair swept suddenly over all the people of the city, and no one gave any thought to nourishment or amusements. The faces of the people on the royal highway were awash with tears. No one showed any sign of delight; all were lost in grief. The cool breeze stopped blowing, the hare-marked moon no longer looked serene, the sun did not warm the world, the universe was in chaos. Husbands became indifferent to their wives, children became indifferent, and brothers, too. All turned their back on everyone else and gave their thoughts to Rama alone. 36.10 36.15

As for Rama’s friends, they were all bewildered; crushed by the weight of their grief, they could not rise from where they lay fallen. Abandoned by the great prince, Ayódhya, with all its hosts of soldiers and herds of horses and elephants, was tormented by a heavy weight of fear and began to quake dreadfully and resound, just as the earth would, mountains and all, if abandoned by Indra, breaker of fortresses.

NOW, AS RAMA was departing he raised a cloud of dust, 37.1 and as long as it was visible the best of the Ikshvákus would not turn his eyes away. As long as the king could see his beloved, righteous son, he seemed to stand firm on the ground just to have him in sight. But once the lord of the land could no longer see even Rama's dust, in anguish and despair he fell to the ground. His wife Kausálya came up and stood by his right arm, and to his left side came Kaikéyi, whose only love was for Bhárata.

The king, a man of prudence, righteousness and cour- 37.5

do not touch me, evil woman. I do not want to see you.
You are not my wife, you have no relationship to me. And your dependents have nothing to do with me, nor I with them. In pure selfishness you repudiated righteousness, and I repudiate you. Once I took your hand and led you round the marriage fire, but now I renounce it all, both in this world and the next. And if Bhárata should be pleased at securing sovereign kingship, may any funeral offering he makes never reach me."

As the lord of men lay coated with dust, Queen Kausálya 37.10 helped him up and, racked with grief, began to lead him home. As if he had intentionally slain a brahman, or held his hand in a fire, the righteous king burned with remorse to think of his son living a life of asceticism. Again and again he turned back, he collapsed in the ruts of the chariot, and his figure, like the sun's at the hour of eclipse, lost all its splendor. Tortured with sorrow, he began to lament as he thought with longing of his beloved son. He imagined his son to be returning to the city, and said: "I see the tracks in the road made by the splendid horses carrying my great son, but I do not see him. No, he is probably now resting 37.15 somewhere, at the foot of a tree, where he will sleep using a log or perhaps a boulder for his pillow. Wretched and caked with dirt he will heave a sigh as he rises from the ground, like the bull of an elephant herd from out of a mountain stream. Men who live in the forest will probably be watching as long-armed Rama, the defender of the world, gets up and pushes on defenselessly. I hope you are satisfied, Kaikéyi. Now inhabit the kingdom a widow. For without the tiger among men I cannot bear to live.”

So the king lamented, and, surrounded by a flood of people, he reentered the best of cities, the way a mourner enters a cemetery. The squares and courtyards were empty, 37.20 the shops and temples closed, the thoroughfares nearly deserted, the people haggard, feeble and racked with sorrow—such was the sight that met the king’s eyes. But his thoughts were for Rama alone and, lost in lamentation, he entered his dwelling, like the sun passing behind a cloud. Without Rama, Vaidéhi and Lákshmana his chamber seemed like a great, placid pool from which Supárna has snatched the serpents.

“Quickly take me to the dwelling of Kausálya, Rama’s mother,” the king demanded, and the watchmen took him. He entered Kausálya’s chamber and lay upon the couch, and his mind began to reel. Looking around, the great and 37.25 mighty king reached out his arms and cried at the top of his voice, “Oh Rághava, you have abandoned me! How lucky those good men who will be alive at the hour when Rama comes back, who will see him and embrace him. I cannot

KAUSÁLYA GAZED at the lord of the land as he lay on the couch prostrate with grief. Racked with grief for her son, she spoke: 38.1

“Now that Kaikéyi like a fork-tongued viper has spit her venom on Rághava, the tiger among men, she will behave like a snake that has shed its skin. Now that she has had her way and exiled Rama, the charming creature will apply herself to further terrorizing me, like a vicious serpent in the house. If only Rama could have lived at home though it meant his begging in the city streets! You had the freedom to grant such a boon, which at the worst had made my son a slave. But you let Kaikéyi at her own sweet pleasure throw Rama from his place and assign him as a portion for rákshasas, the way a sacrificer at the half-month rites throws a portion away for them. 38.5

My mighty son, the great-armed bowman with a step like a king of elephants, is probably now entering the forest with his wife and Lákshmana. They have never known the sorrows of the forest, but you yielded to Kaikéyi and abandoned them to a life in the forest. What can be their lot? Stripped of everything of value and exiled at the very hour of their triumph, how are these three wretched young people to live with nothing but fruit and roots to eat? If only it were now the hour that mercifully will end my grief, when I set eyes on Rághava again with his wife and brother. When will Ayódhya hear that the two mighty brothers have 38.10 come back and once again be a glorious city, crowded with delighted people, garlanded with banners? When will the city see those tigers among men returned from the forest and exult in delight like the ocean on a full-moon night?

When will the great-armed mighty prince enter the city of Ayódhya with Sita on the chariot ahead of him, like a cow before her bull? When will people by the thousand go out onto the royal highway to scatter parched grain upon my two foe-taming sons as they make their entrance? When will maidens proffer flowers and fruit to the brahmans and reverently circle the city in delight? When will he come back 38.15 to me—my righteous son, young as a deathless god yet with an old man's wisdom and boyishness that warms my heart?

I guess, my mighty husband, yes, it must no doubt be that once upon a time, when calves were thirsting to drink, I ruthlessly hacked off the udders of the cows, their mothers. And so now, tiger among men, I who love my child so have been made childless by Kaikéyi, as brutally as a lion might do to a cow with a young calf. For I have but one son—he is gifted with every virtue, a master of all learning—and without my son I cannot bear to live. I have not the least bit of strength to live in this world if I cannot see my beloved and mighty great-armed son. Here, see, a fire kindled by 38.20

“My noble lady, your son is the very best of men and truly virtuous. What need have you to lament like this and wretchedly weep? You should never grieve over Rama, my lady, so excellent a son. He left surrendering the kingship, powerful as he is, to ensure that his great father might be true to his word. He took his stand by righteousness as the learned scrupulously practice it, and which has its rewards everlastingly, at death. Blameless Lákshmana will be a blessing to the great prince. He has always behaved with perfect propriety toward him, and he shows compassion to all creatures. Though Vaidéhi is fully aware how painful life in the wilderness is, though she has known only comfort, she is following your righteous son. 39.5

What gain has your mighty son failed to reap, who is waving the banner of his fame throughout the world by his self-restraint and devotion to truth? Clearly the sun will recognize Rama’s purity and incomparable grandeur, and will not dare to burn his body with its rays. A pleasant breeze will attend on Rághava, blowing through the woodlands, gracious at all seasons, with temperate warmth or coolness. As the blameless prince sleeps at night, the moon like a father will clasp him in its embrace, caress him with cool beams and refresh him. Then, too, the mighty prince was given divine weapons by Brahma, when he saw him slay in battle the lord of *dánava*s, Timi-dhvaja’s son. 39.10

Your son will soon return to Ayódhya to grant you every boon, will soon bow down and clasp your feet with his firm and gentle hands.” 39.15

After the mother of Rama, the wife of the god of men, had listened to the words of Lákshmana’s mother, the grief in her suddenly dissipated, like a cloud in the autumn when it holds but little water.

NOW, AS THE great prince Rama, who always strove for truth, was setting out to make his life in the forest, men loyal to him continued to follow. Though the multitude of his loved ones and the king had been forced to turn back, these would not stop following Rama’s chariot. For to the men who lived in Ayódhya the glorious and virtuous prince was as well loved as the full moon. His subjects kept pleading with him but Kakútstha, to ensure his father’s truthfulness, would only press on to the forest. 40.1

Rama gazed at his people with affection, as if to drink them in with his eyes. And he spoke to them affectionately as though they were his children: “Let the love and respect the residents of Ayódhya feel for me be transferred in full to Bhárata, as a kindness to me. Bhárata, the delight of Kaikéyi, is of exemplary conduct, and he will do all that is required to ensure your welfare and happiness. Though only a boy, 40.5

And, finally, if you would do me a kindness, please take care that the great king does not suffer when I have gone to live in the forest." 40.10

But the more committed to righteousness Dasha-rathi showed himself to be, the more the subjects desired to have him as their lord. By their virtues Rama and Sau-mítri seemed to bind and draw to them the desolate, tearful people of the city. Now, certain brahmans who were elders on three counts—by their years, wisdom and authority—began to cry out from afar, their heads shaking with age: "Ho there, you purebred horses speeding away with Rama. Stop, turn back! Be good to your master. You should be carrying your master back, not away from the city to the forest." When Rama perceived the anguished outcry raised by the aged brahmans, he alighted at once from the chariot. 40.15
Rama then, with Sita and Lákshmana, proceeded on foot, with measured tread, directing his attention wholly to the forest. For the brahmans were on foot, and Rama looked with pity on them. He so cherished propriety that he could not ride off and leave them.

Seeing that Rama only continued on, the brahmans were disconcerted and in deep agony they said to him: "The entire brahman order will follow you, best friend of brahmans, and these sacred fires will accompany you, borne on the shoulders of the twice-born. Just see the umbrellas given 40.20 to us at the Vaja-peya rite, which are following along behind you like geese when the rains have ended. You never got your royal parasol, and, when the sun's rays are burning you, we will shade you with these, our own Vaja-peya umbrellas. We have always turned our minds to the study of the Vedic hymns, but now our minds are made up on your account, dear child, to turn to a life in the forest. Our greatest treasure, the Vedas, lies stored in our hearts; our wives shall stay at home protected by their chastity. Our decision will not be reconsidered; we have made up our minds to go with you.

But, as you have always shown regard for righteousness, will any regard now be paid to what is right?

We have bowed our heads, white-haired as the wild goose 40.25 and covered now with dust from falling prone upon the ground; we have pleaded with you to return, you who have always done what is proper. Many of the brahmans who have come here have already commenced sacrifices. Their consummation depends on your returning, dear child. All living things, moving and unmoving, are filled with devotion for you. Show your devotion to these devotees, who are pleading with you. The trees, unable to follow you because their roots prevent their movement, seem to be mourning as the gusting wind uplifts them. Even the birds have stopped flitting about and foraging for food. They sit in one place in the trees, pleading with you, who have always taken pity on all creatures." And, as the brahmans sent up this mournful 40.30 wail in order to turn Rághava back, the Támasa River came into view to aid, so it seemed, in stopping him.

NOW, WHEN RÁGHAVA had reached the lovely bank of the Tāmāsa, with a glance at Sita he addressed Saumítri: “Night has come to the forest now, the very first of our life in the forest. But please, Saumítri, do not be sad. Look, the woods are empty but all around they seem to weep: birds and beasts are hidden within them, each gone to its own lair. Surely the city of Ayódhya, my father’s capital, will grieve tonight, every man and woman, for us who have gone away. But I know that righteous Bhárata will comfort my father and mother, speaking words in harmony with what is right, beneficial and desirable. I have been reflecting all the while on Bhárata’s good-heartedness, and I no longer feel grief for my father, Lákshmana or even for my mother. You have done your duty in accompanying me, tiger among men. But let me seek your help, too, in looking after Vaidéhi. I myself, however, will have nothing but water tonight. This is what I prefer, though all kinds of forest fare are at hand.”

So Rághava spoke to Saumítri, and, turning to Sumántra he said, “Do not neglect the horses, dear friend.” Sumántra tethered the horses as the sun was setting, gave them abundant fodder and then waited in attendance. When Rama had worshipped the gracious twilight and saw night closing in, the charioteer, with Saumítri’s help, made a bed for him. Escorted by Saumítri, Rama found the bed of leaves made ready near the bank of the Tāmāsa, and he and his wife then retired. When Lákshmana saw that his brother had fallen asleep with his wife, he engaged the charioteer in conversation, talking about Rama’s many virtues. Saumítri stayed awake all night long, and even as the sun rose he was still speaking of Rama’s virtues with the charioteer on the bank of the Tāmāsa. There, at a little distance from the Tāmāsa 41.15 where herds of cattle crowded the bank, Rama spent the night with his people.

And when, on rising, mighty Rama observed them, he said to his good brother Lákshmana: “Look at them now, Lákshmana, asleep under the trees. They care for us alone, Saumítri, caring nothing even for their own homes. So solemn is their commitment to turn us back that the townsmen would sooner throw their lives away than abandon their resolve. While they are still sleeping, we must board the chariot and quickly go, taking a path free from danger.
No resident of the city of the Ikshvákus should now, or ever 41.20 again, have to sleep at the foot of a tree out of loyalty to me.
A prince should spare his townsmen any troubles that are his affair alone. Surely he must not involve the residents of the city in his own trouble.” Lákshmana replied to Rama as though it were Righteousness that stood embodied before his eyes: “I agree, my wise brother. Let us board at once.”

In haste then the charioteer harnessed the splendid horses to the coach and, with hands cupped in reverence, directed Rama to it. But in order to confuse the townsmen Rama instructed the charioteer, “Board the chariot, Sumántra, and head northward. Hurry onward for a while, then circle back 41.25 on the chariot. You must take care to ensure that the townsmen do not know where I have gone.” The charioteer did just as Rama told him, and on returning he directed Rama to the coach. Rághava boarded with all his equipment and crossed the swift-flowing, eddying Tāmāsa. Once across, the great-armed, majestic prince entered upon a broad pathway,

When night brightened into dawn and the townsmen found themselves without Rághava, their minds were stunned, and they were paralyzed by a crushing grief. Drenched in tears of grief, they searched high and low, but to their bitter sorrow they caught not a glimpse of Rama. For a short while they followed the track, and when it gave out a wild despair swept over them. When the track of the chariot gave out, the sensible among them turned back, thinking, “What can this mean? What are we to do? Fate has crushed us.” Then all of them, with weary hearts, returned the way they had come to the city of Ayódhya, where all good people were still in a state of shock. 41.30

SO THE RESIDENTS of the city returned from following Rama, but all their strength seemed to have gone, and they were left insensible. They went each to his own dwelling and there, surrounded by their wives and children, they all broke out in weeping, and their faces were bathed in tears. No one felt any delight or gladness, merchants would not display their wares, no goods were set out to catch the eye. Householders would have no meals prepared. People felt no joy at finding something long thought lost, or obtaining vast wealth. Mothers felt no joy at delivering a firstborn son. 42.1

In one house after another the women cried when their husbands came home, and in the anguish of their sorrow they berated them with words as piercing as elephant goads: “What good are homes or wives or wealth, what good are 42.5

sons or pleasures to those who have lost the sight of Rághava? The one decent man in the world is Lákshmana, who with Sita is following Rama Kakútstha to serve him in the forest. Fortunate the streams, the lotus ponds and lakes where Kakútstha will bathe, plunging into the pure water. The woodlands and the lovely groves will adorn Kakútstha, and so will the streams with their broad shores, and the steep-sloping mountains. Every hill or grove Rama visits will treat him like a welcome guest and not fail to accord him hospitality. The mountains will be crowned with many-colored blossoms and bear clusters of bouquets when Rama comes, and in sympathy they will display for him choice fruits and flowers even out of season. They will afford him views of waterfalls as well, one after the other, and the trees on the summits will gladden Rághava. 42.10

Where Rama goes there is nothing to fear, and no one ever comes to grief. He is a great-armed hero and the son of Dasha-ratha. So let us follow Rághava before he is too far away from us. How pleasant the shadow of the feet of such a great master as he; for he is the one defender of this people, he their one recourse and refuge. We shall attend on Sita, and you on Rághava." Such were the things the townsmen's wives told their husbands. And in the anguish of their sorrow they continued: 42.15

"Rághava will see to it that you are safe and sound in the wilderness, and Sita will do the same for us, the womenfolk. Who could find any joy in living here, where the people are filled with longing, a place so cheerless, so unpleasant and dispiriting? Kaikéyi's hands, we would have no further use for living, much less for children or riches. Kaikéyi, that disgrace to her family, renounced her son and husband both for the sake of kingly power. Why then should she be expected to spare anyone else?

kéyi, so long as she lives, or we do. Upon our sons we swear it. Who could live at ease under that unrighteous, wicked woman, so heartless that she forced into exile the son of the lord of kings? For with Rama banished, the lord of the land will not long survive, and in the wake of Dasha-ratha's death will clearly follow total devastation. Utterly impoverished, luckless men! Better to mix poison and take it now. For either you follow Rághava or you shall never be heard from again. Rama, his wife and Lákshmana have been treacherously banished, and all of us delivered up to Bhárata like livestock to the butcher."

Such was the lamentation raised throughout the town by 42.25
the townsmen's wives, and they wailed in agony, as if they feared for their very lives. The women were as anguished on Rama's account as if a son of theirs or a brother had been exiled. Desolate, they lamented and madly wept, for he meant more to them, in fact, than their own sons.

NOW, IN WHAT remained of the same night Rama, tiger 43.1 among men, travelled a great distance, mindful of his father's command. As he travelled gracious night departed.
He then worshipped the gracious morning twilight and afterward pushed on to the frontier of the realm. Drawn by his splendid horses, he proceeded swiftly—though it seemed so slow to him—observing the villages with their wide-spaced boundaries and the forests all in flower, hearing the cries of the people who made their homes in the villages:
“A curse upon King Dasha·ratha for succumbing to the 43.5 power of passion!” “Ah, Kaikéyi is a vicious and evil woman always doing evil, a heartless woman who has gone beyond all limits. Today she has done a heartless deed in exiling the prince to a life in the forest, so righteous a prince, so wise, compassionate and steadfast.”

Such were the words of the people who made their homes in the villages, and the mighty lord of Kósala heard them as he passed beyond the land of Kósala. He then crossed the Veda·shruti, a river running with gracious water, and continued on toward the region where Agástya lived. He travelled a long while and then crossed the Gómati, a chilly 43.10 river flowing to the sea, its shores teeming with cows. After fording the Gómati on his swift horses Rághava crossed the Syándika River, where the cries of geese and peacocks resounded. Rama pointed out to Vaidéhi the land King Manu long ago bestowed upon Ikshváku, a rich land encircled by vassal kingdoms. And often the majestic bull among men would address his chariot driver in a voice like the call of the wild goose, saying, “When shall I come back, charioteer, and again go hunting in the flowering forest beside the Sárayu, reunited with my mother and father? I so long to hunt in the forest beside the Sárayu. That is a pleasure without equal in the world, one the hosts of royal seers have always prized.” Of these and other matters Aikshváka spoke 43.15 with the charioteer in his sweet voice as he continued on his way.

AFTER PASSING THROUGH the broad and lovely land of 44.1 Kósala, Lákshmana’s great-armed eldest brother reached the outskirts of Shringa-vera-pura. There Rághava saw the Ganges, the heavenly river that goes by three paths, its gracious water unclogged by weeds; a holy river frequented by seers, ringing with the cries of geese and cranes and the calls of sheldrakes, swarming with dolphins, crocodiles and snakes. As the great chariot-fighter gazed over its wave-capped eddies, he said to the charioteer Sumántra, “We shall spend the night here. There, not far from the river, is 44.5 a towering almond tree with luxuriant flowers and shoots. Charioteer, we shall spend the night there.” “As you wish,” replied Lákshmana and Sumántra, and the two then turned the horses toward the almond tree. On reaching the lovely tree Rama, the delight of the Ikshvákus, alighted from the chariot with his wife and Lákshmana. Sumántra alighted as well, and after unhitching the splendid horses he cupped his hands in reverence and stood in attendance on Rama at the foot of the tree.

Now, the king of the region was named Guha, a friend of Rama and precious to him as life. He was of the Nisháda tribe, a powerful man and famed as their chief. He had heard that Rama, tiger among men, had come into his realm, and, accompanied by his aged ministers and kinsmen, he approached him. Seeing that Guha, overlord of the Nishádas, was waiting at a distance, Rama went out with Saumítri to meet him. 44.10

Guha embraced Rághava in anguish, saying: “This land, no less than Ayódhya, belongs to you. What may I do for you, Rama?” Then at once he had the welcome offering brought along with an assortment of choice foods and drinks, and he said: “I bid you welcome, great-armed prince. This entire land belongs to you. We are servants, you the master. Come, our kingdom is yours to rule. There is food at hand, solid, soft and liquid, and sweet things to lick; comfortable beds as well, and fodder for your horses.” 44.15

So Guha spoke, and Rághava replied, “You honor and delight us in every way by your coming here on foot and your display of affection.” He clasped him tight in his well-shaped arms and added, “How fortunate to see you, Guha, you and your kinsmen, in good health. All is well with you, I hope, with your kingdom, your treasury and your allies. I must, however, refuse everything you have so kindly made ready, for I am not in a position to accept. You must know that I am now an ascetic, whose home is in the forest, whose sole aim is to follow the ways of righteousness, who must dress in kusha grass, bark and hides, and live on fruit and roots. It is only fodder for the horses I need, nothing more. My honored friend will do me great homage with that alone. 44.20

For these horses are cherished by my father, King Dasha-ratha, and it will be hospitality enough for me if they are well cared for." Guha then straightway ordered water and fodder for the horses. "Fetch it at once," he told his men.

Wearing an upper garment of bark cloth, Rama then performed the twilight worship and took as his only refreshment the water Lákshmana brought himself. Afterward, as Rama lay upon the ground, Lákshmana washed his feet and his wife's, and then withdrew, taking up a position beside the tree. Saumítri was engaged in conversation by the charioteer and Guha, who also kept vigilant watch over Rama, his bow at the ready. And so the great prince, a man who had never before known pain, but only pleasure, the wise and glorious Dasha-rathi lay there as the night dragged slowly by. 44.25

AS LÁKSHMANA RÁGHAVA stood there wide awake on his brother's behalf, Guha burned with a burning sorrow and said to him: "Here is a comfortable bed, my friend, made ready on your behalf. Come, prince, rest in comfort upon it. My people are all used to hardship; you are used to comfort. We will stay awake tonight to watch over Kakútstha. There is no one on earth dearer to me than Rama. I am telling the truth, and by my truth I swear it to you. Whatever hope I may have in this world for great glory, for the full acquisition of righteousness, or of simple wealth, I have by reason of his grace. And I for my part, bow in hand and in the company of my kinsmen, will protect my dear friend Rama, come what may, as he lies asleep with Sita. without my knowing of it. Moreover, we are prepared to withstand even a vast army of four divisions.”

Lákshmana replied to him, “With you protecting us here, blameless Guha, with righteousness alone in view, we could have nothing to fear. But how, while Dasha-rathi is lying on the ground with Sita, could I find sleep—or any happiness in life? Look at him, Guha, reposing with Sita on the grass, a man whom all the gods and ásuras could not withstand in battle. This is the only one of Dasha-ratha’s sons to resemble him in every trait—a son obtained by means of austerities, Vedic recitations, and all kinds of heavy labors. With him in banishment the king will not long remain alive. The earth will surely soon be widowed. The women must have cried out their last great cries and ceased in exhaustion. The din, I expect, has ceased in the king’s palace, my friend. 45.10

I have little hope that Kausálya, the king or my mother will live out this night. Even if my mother should live through it to look after Shatrúghna, Kausálya’s sorrow is such that she, who bore this one heroic son, will perish. Caught up in the king’s calamity the city, which once brought gladness with its pleasant aspect, will perish with all its loyal people. And my father, who never got the wish that just eluded him, who never installed Rama in the kingship, will perish, too. And when that moment comes, when father passes away and they purify the lord of the land with all the rites for the dead, they will have attained their object. Then they will stroll at their ease through my father’s capital, through its lovely squares and well-ordered thoroughfares; 45.15

If only we might return to Ayódhya when our stay in the forest is over to find him well and his promise fulfilled.” 45.20

So the night passed with the great prince standing there mourning, racked with sorrow. And when the good prince had spoken these forthright words, Guha wept in deep compassion, crushed by the calamity and tormented by heartache, like an elephant tormented by a raging fever.

WHEN NIGHT HAD brightened into dawn, broad-chested glorious Rama spoke to good Lákshmana Saumítri: “It is the hour of sunrise, blessed night has gone. Over there, dear brother, the jet-black bird, the cuckoo, is calling. You can hear the sound of peacocks crying in the forest. Let us cross the Jáhnavi, dear Lákshmana, the swift river that flows to the sea.” Heeding Rama’s words, Saumítri, the delight of his friends, bade farewell to Guha and the charioteer and stood before his brother. Then, after strapping on their quivers and buckling on their swords, the two Rághavas took up their bows and went with Sita down to the Ganges. 46.1 46.5

Now the charioteer deferentially approached righteous Rama and, cupping his hands in reverence, he asked, “What then am I to do?” “Go back,” Rama answered. “You have done enough for me. We shall relinquish the coach and I guess there is no reward for chastity or Vedic study, for lenience, or uprightness, if such a calamity has befallen you. Living in the forest with Vaidéhi and your brother, mighty Rághava, you will achieve as high an end as if you had conquered the three worlds. But surely we are lost, Rama, even you have misled us. For we shall come under the power of evil Kaikéyi, and only sorrow can be our lot.” So the charioteer Sumántra spoke to the prince who was precious to him as life. And as he looked at Rama, so far from home, he was racked with sorrow, and for a long while he wept. 46.10

His tears stopping, the charioteer sipped water, and when he was thus purified, Rama addressed him gently but insistently:

“I do not know of any friend the Ikshvákus have to equal you. It is you who must take care that King Dasha-ratha not grieve for me. The lord of the world is aged, his heart has been crushed by grief and a heavy burden of desire weighs him down. That is why I tell you this: Whatever orders the great lord of the land may give in his desire to please Kaikéyi must be obeyed without demur. For it is to this end lords of men take up the rule of kingdoms, that their will never be opposed in anything they require. provoked and that he does not languish under sorrow. The king has never known sorrow before; he is aged, noble and self-controlled. First do obeisance to him and then address him in my name as follows: 'I do not grieve at all, nor does Lákshmana or Máithili, that we have been expelled from Ayódhya or that we must live in the forest. As soon as the fourteen years are over we will come home, and you shall look upon each of us again, Sita, Lákshmana and me.' 46.20

After speaking to the king, Sumántra, ask my mother, ask Kaikéyi and all the other queens after their health, each one in turn. And tell Kausálya for me that Sita, Lákshmana and I, her noble son, send her respectful greetings. Then you must tell the great king, 'Send for Bhárata at once. As soon as Bhárata returns he must be installed in office with the approval of the kings. Once you have taken Bhárata in your arms and consecrated him as prince regent, sorrow for our suffering will no longer oppress you.' And tell this to Bhárata: 'You must treat your mothers, all of them, without distinction, the same way you treat the king. Just as you draw no distinction between Kaikéyi and Sumitra, so draw none at all with regard to Queen Kausálya, my mother.' 46.25

Though stricken with grief at being sent back by Rama, Sumántra heard everything he said and then affectionately replied to Kakútstha: "If, emboldened by my affection, I do not speak as a subordinate should, attribute it to my deep devotion and forgive me what I say. How shall I return without you, dear Rama, to a city that, at parting from you, went mad with such grief as one feels for a son? Think how the people were, merely seeing Rama aboard my chariot. fall to pieces. The city will be desolated when it sees the chariot empty. It would be as if, out of its whole army, only a charioteer survived, while all its brave warriors were slain in battle. Just now, while you still stood before them, the people felt sick at heart just to contemplate you, in their mind's eye, living far away. The cry of anguish the townsmen raised at your banishment will be increased a hundredfold when they observe me all alone in the chariot. 46.35

And what am I to tell the queen? 'I have taken your son to your brother's family, so do not agonize'? Would I not have to say something like this, untruthful as it is? For how can I tell the truth when it is so painful? The splendid horses, it is true, respond to my command, but they are used to pulling you and your kinsmen. How will they pull the chariot when you are not in it? If, despite my pleading, you insist on leaving me, I will board the chariot and set it on fire the moment you do. There will be creatures in the forest that will disturb your austerities, Rághava, and I could chase them off with the chariot. Thanks to you I have known the joy of tending your chariot, and I hope and pray that thanks to you I may know the joy of life in the forest. Oh, be gracious, I wish to wait upon you in the wilderness. My one wish is to have the pleasure of hearing you say, 'Wait upon me.' As I live in the forest I will obey you with bowed head. I am ready to give up everything, Ayódhya and the world of the gods itself. 46.40

I cannot in any case enter Ayódhya without you, any more than a man of evil conduct can gain entrance to the capital of great Indra. And the horses too, mighty Rama, will attain their highest destiny if they can render you any service while you live in the forest. My fondest dream is that, when your stay in the forest has come to an end, I may convey you back to the city in this same chariot. In your company the fourteen years in the forest will pass like so many minutes, and without you they will seem like as many centuries. You have always cherished your servants, and I am a devoted servant only following the path his master's son has taken, only following the proper course. Please, do not leave me." 46.45

So the desolate Sumántra implored him, over and over, in every way he knew, and Rama, who always felt compassion for his servants, replied to him: "I know the profound devotion you bear me, and how you cherish your master. But you must hear the reason I have for sending you back to the city. When my younger mother Kaikéyi sees that you have returned to the city, she will be convinced I have truly gone to the forest. And if the queen is satisfied that I have gone to live in the forest, she will no longer harbor suspicions that the righteous king has spoken falsely. This is my first consideration—that my younger mother should gain the kingdom for her son, and that it may thrive under Bhárata's protection. As a kindness to me and to the king, you must go back to the city with the chariot and faithfully deliver each and every message imparted to you." 46.50

So Rama addressed the charioteer and comforted him at length. Then in a manful and purposeful tone he addressed Guha: “I will mat my hair and go. Please fetch me some sap of the banyan tree.” Guha at once brought the sap to the prince, and with it Rama matted his own and Lákshmana’s hair. As they stood there dressed in bark cloth and bearing a crown of matted hair, the brothers Rama and Lákshmana resembled a pair of seers. Having entered with Lákshmana upon the way of forest hermits and adopted their vow, Rama turned one last time to his friend Guha: “Never neglect your army, Guha, your treasury, stronghold or populace. Nothing is deemed so hard to preserve as the position of a king.” The delight of the Ikshvákus then dismissed Guha and with determination went off swiftly with his wife and Lákshmana. 46.55 46.60

Now, at the riverbank the delight of the Ikshvákus saw a boat. Preparing to cross the swift-flowing Ganges, he said to Lákshmana: “Carefully board the boat that is standing ready, tiger among men. Then take hold of the spirited woman Sita and help her to board.” Hearing his brother’s command and in no way opposing it, the self-respecting prince first helped Máithili aboard and then boarded himself. Only then did Lákshmana’s mighty eldest brother go on board, along with some of Guha’s kinsmen, who went at the urging of the overlord of the Nishádas. After dismissing Sumántra, Guha and his army, Rama took his seat in the boat and urged on the boatmen. They in turn urged on the boat, which, guided by the helmsman and propelled by the rush of their strong oars, moved swiftly out across the water. 46.65

When they reached the middle of the Bhagi-rathi, faultless Vaidéhi cupped her hands in reverence and addressed the river: "This is the son of the great king, wise Dasha-ratha. Protect him, O Ganges, and let him carry out his instructions. After living in the woodlands a full fourteen years, may he return once again with his brother and me. And then, O beautiful goddess Ganges, when I have come back safely, I will sacrifice to you in gladness for making all my wishes come true. O goddess, you are the river of three paths, you behold the world of Brahma and show yourself in our world as wife of the ocean king. I pay you homage, goddess, I sing your praises, lovely one. When the tiger among men has safely returned and secured the kingship, I will give the brahmans a hundred thousand cows, garments and exquisite food in hope of pleasing you." 46.70

Addressing the Ganges in this fashion, the faultless and courteous Sita soon reached the southern bank. Arriving at the bank, the bull among men, slayer of foes, left the boat and prepared to set out with his brother and Vaidéhi. 46.75

The great-armed prince said to his brother, the delight of Sumitra, "Go in front, Saumítri, let Sita follow behind you. I shall go last, to protect you and Sita. But all the same, today Vaidéhi will come to know the pain of life in the forest." Now, while Rama was speeding to the further shore of the Ganges, Sumántra had watched continuously, but when the distance grew too great he turned his gaze away, and in shock and misery he wept. On the further bank the brothers killed four large animals—a boar, an antelope, a gazelle and a great black buck. They were famished and took meat hurriedly, and at sunset made for a tree beneath which they could spend the night.

ON REACHING THE tree, Rama, the most pleasing of men, 47.1 performed the evening twilight worship and then spoke to Lákshmana. “This is the first night we shall spend outside our country without Sumántra, but please, do not be sad about it. From now on we must remain constantly vigilant at night, Lákshmana, for the safety of Sita is in our hands. We shall have to spend this night as best we can, Saumítri. We shall have to settle down upon the ground itself strewn only with what we gather with our own hands.”

Later, as Rama lay on the earth—a prince accustomed 47.5 to a sumptuous bed—he began to talk with Saumítri, and these were the heartfelt words he spoke: “It must be the sleep of sorrow, Lákshmana, that the great king is sleeping tonight. Kaikéyi, however, must be content since her desires have been satisfied. But is it not possible that Queen Kaikéyi, when she sees Bhárata back home again, may try to take the great king’s life, to make her son the king? And being old and defenseless and parted from me what will he do? Such is his desire for Kaikéyi that he is completely in her power. Reflecting on this calamity and how the king so utterly changed his mind, I have come to the conclusion that the urgings of desire far outweigh both statecraft and righteousness. For what man, even a fool, would forsake his 46.10 own son—a son who ever bowed to his will—on account of a woman, as father forsook me, Lákshmana?

Kaikéyi's son Bhárata and his wife must indeed be joyful. Like an absolute monarch he will have the happy land of Kósala all to himself. Indeed, with father well on in years and me withdrawn to the wilderness, he will be the single head of the entire kingdom. Whoever forsakes righteousness and statecraft and follows the urgings of desire will soon come to grief, just like King Dasha-ratha. I am convinced, dear brother, that Kaikéyi came among us just to bring about Dasha-ratha's end, my banishment and Bhárata's accession to kingship. Is it not possible that even now, in the flush 47.15 of her good fortune, Kaikéyi may be persecuting Kausályā and Sumitra because of me? May Queen Sumitra never live in sorrow on my account. You must go straight back to Ayódhya tomorrow morning, Lákshmana.

I shall go on alone with Sita to the Dándakas, and you will be there to defend the defenseless Kausályā. For Kaikéyi can be spiteful, and in her hatred she may do something reckless. You must commit my mother to the care of Bhárata, who knows what is right. It must be that in some past life women were separated from their sons by my mother's doing, Saumítri, and so this has happened to her. For Kau- 47.20 sályā nurtured me long and with great difficulty raised me. And now at the very moment of her reward she has been separated from me—a curse on me! May no one who parts her hair ever bear a son like me, Saumítri, who have given my mother grief without end. Lákshmana, I think even her myna bird is a greater source of joy than I. The bird at least is there to cry out, 'Parrot, bite the enemy's foot.'

What good am I, tamer of foes, a son who does nothing to help her as she grieves in her misfortune? She might as well be childless. Bereft of me, my unfortunate mother Kausálya has been plunged into a sea of grief and lies there racked by bitter sorrow. In my rage, Lákshmana, all by myself I could overpower Ayódhya or the whole world with my arrows. But truly force is useless. I fear the danger of unrighteousness, blameless Lákshmana, and I fear what other people might say. That is why I do not have myself consecrated at once.” 47.25

Such and many other pitiful words of lamentation did Rama utter that night, in that desolate place. Then he fell silent, his face bathed in tears. When Rama had broken off his lamentation and lay like a damped-down fire or a sea becalmed, Lákshmana tried to comfort him. “It is true, Rama, best of warriors, that the city of Ayódhya will be gloomy tonight now that you have departed, like the night when the moon is gone. But it is to no avail, Rama, that you torment yourself like this. You are only disheartening Sita, and me, too, bull among men. Neither Sita nor I could live an instant without you, Rághava. We would be like fish plucked out of the water. No, without you, slayer of enemies, I would not care to see Father now, not Shatrúghna, Sumitra or heaven itself.” Rághava, slayer of enemies, listened to Lákshmana’s earnest words and at last, recognizing it as the way of righteousness, he considerably gave him permission to live in the forest for all the years to come. 47.30

 they set out from that place when the bright sun rose. Plunging into the great forest, they headed toward the place where Bhagi-rathi, the River Ganges, joins the Yámuna. And here and there, as the glorious party made their way, different types of landscape came into view, and charming places such as they had never seen before. Rama took the safest path, observing the different sorts of trees, and as day was drawing to a close he spoke to Saumítri:

“Look at the smoke, blessed Agni’s banner, rising above 48.5 Prayága. I think the sage Bharad-vaja must live nearby, Sau-mítri. We must have reached the confluence of the Ganges and the Yámuna, for you can hear the sound of water dashing against water. Here are logs hewn by foresters, Bharadvaja’s dependents, and there you can see the different sorts of trees around his ashram.”

The brothers went on at an easy pace bearing their bows, and as the sun was hanging low they came to the sage’s abode at the confluence of the Ganges and the Yámuna. The deer and birds were frightened as Rama entered the ashram.
 Proceeding along the path, he soon came upon Bharad-vaja.
 With Sita following behind, the mighty brothers arrived at 48.10 the ashram and stood some distance off, eagerly awaiting the appearance of the sage. The illustrious sage soon completed the fire offering, and the moment Rama saw him he cupped his hands in reverence and with Saumítri and Sita did obei-sance to him. Lákshmana’s eldest brother then identified himself to him: “Holy one, we are two sons of Dasha-ratha, Rama and Lákshmana. And this is my wife Vaidéhi, the lovely daughter of Jánaka. The faultless woman is following me to the desolate groves of asceticism. When my father banished me, Saumítri, my beloved younger brother here, faithfully accompanied me to the forest. On my father's orders, holy one, we are to enter a grove of asceticism. There we will strictly follow the way of righteousness, living only on roots and fruit." 48.15

Upon hearing the words of the wise prince, the righteous sage presented him with a cow, the welcome offering and water. Then, sitting with deer and birds and sages all around him, the sage welcomed his visitor Rama and showed him hospitality. Rághava accepted his hospitality and took a seat, and then Bharad·vaja addressed him with these righteous words: "So at last I see you here, Kakútstha. I have heard about this, about your unwarranted exile. This is an isolated spot, here at the confluence of the two great rivers. It is a sacred and delightful place, and you can live here comfortably." So Bharad·vaja spoke, and Rama Rághava made a forthright reply, for the welfare of all was his chief concern: "Holy one, not far from here live people of both town and province, and they will come to visit Vaidéhi and me. For this reason I cannot consent to our living here. Please think of some good site for an ashram, holy one, in a secluded place, one that will delight Jánaka's daughter Vaidéhi, who deserves every comfort." 48.20

The great sage Bharad·vaja, hearing Rághava's forthright words, answered him in a way that carried conviction. "Twenty miles from here, my son, is a mountain where you may live. It is a sacred place where great seers make their home, with a pleasant prospect at every turn. Langurs range about it, and monkeys and apes live there. Its name is 48.25

Chitra-kuta, and it looks like Mount Gandha-mádana. As long as a man beholds the peaks of Chitra-kuta, he meditates on blessed things and does not turn his mind to evil. Many seers have passed their hundred autumns there, and by means of their austerities have ascended to heaven with skull-white heads. It is an isolated place to live, one that I think will please you; or you may live here with me, Rama, for the duration of your stay in the forest.” Thus Bharad- 48.30 vaja, wise in the ways of righteousness, received his dear guest Rama, his wife and brother, and fulfilled their every desire. And when holy night came on, Rama was still at Prayága in the company of the great seer, holding animated conversation.

But when night had brightened into dawn, the tiger among men came before Bharad-vaja, a sage of brilliant powers, and said: “Last night, holy one, we made our dwelling here, in your ashram. Now, truthful sage, give us leave to depart.” Now that they had passed the night, Bharad-va- 48.35

Establish your ashram when you reach that gracious mountain—the call of lapwing and cuckoo echoes there, the deer in rut and the many elephants make it very pleasant.”

AFTER SPENDING THE night there, the princes, tamers of 49.1
foes, did obeisance to the great seer and went off toward the mountain. As the great sage observed them setting out, he followed behind as a father would follow his children, and he began to speak: “Now, when you reach the swift-flowing Kalíndi, the daughter of the sun, make a raft there and cross the river. There you will come upon a great banyan tree with lush green leaves, called Shyama. It has grown dense with its many trunks and is the haunt of perfected beings. Two miles beyond it, Rama, you will see a dark thicket, a mixture of flame trees, jujubes and Yámuna bamboo. That is the way to Chitra-kuta. I have travelled it many times, for it is pleasant and easy, and quite safe from forest fires.” After describing the way to them, the great seer turned back. 49.5

When the sage had gone, Rama said to Lákshmana, “How fortunate we are, Saumítri, that the sage has shown us such compassion.” Conversing in this fashion, the brothers, tigers among men, proceeded in high spirits to the Kalíndi River with Sita before them. They lashed together logs to fashion a good-sized raft, and Lákshmana cut some wood to make a comfortable seat for Sita. Next, Rama Dasha-rathi helped her board the raft, and as he did so she was half-embarrassed, his beloved wife, a woman as marvelous as the goddess Shri. Then on the raft they crossed the Yámuna, daughter of the sun, a swift-flowing, wave-wreathed river with trees growing thick along her banks. 49.10

Once across they abandoned the raft, and setting out from the Yámuna forest they reached Shyama, the cool, green-leafed banyan tree. “O that I may see Kausálya again, and glorious Sumíttra.” Such was the wish Sita made as she walked around the tree, hands cupped in reverence. Proceeding two miles further, the brothers Rama and Lákshmana killed many animals such as are pure to consume and ate them in a grove by the Yámuna. They passed the time pleasantly in the lovely grove resounding with flocks of peacocks 49.15 and teeming with elephants and monkeys. Then, no longer looking sad, they repaired to a spot where the riverbank was level and found a suitable place to pass the night.

way the delight of the Raghus gently roused him. "Saumítri, listen to the sweet sounds the forest creatures are making. Let us be off, slayer of enemies, it is time for us to depart." Even though his brother had roused him the very moment he was dozing off, Lákshmana at once shook off his sleep and lassitude and the fatigue of constant travel. They all rose and sipped the gracious water of the river and then set out on the path to Chitra-kuta described by the seer.

As Rama set out in the early morning with Saumítri, 50.5
he began to speak to lotus-eyed Sita. "Look, Vaidéhi, the kínshuka trees are in full blossom now that winter is past. Garlanded with their red flowers they almost seem to be on fire. Look at the marking-nut trees in bloom, untended by man, how they are bent over with fruit and leaves. I know I shall be able to live. Look at the honeycombs, Lákshmana, amassed by honeybees on one tree after another. They hang down large as buckets. Here a moorhen is crying, and in answer to it a peacock calls through delightful stretches of forest richly carpeted with flowers. And look, there is Chi- 50.10

So the brothers and Sita proceeded on foot and reached the delightful mountain, charming Chitra-kuta. And on reaching the mountain, where birds of every description came flocking, he said, “This will be our dwelling for now. We shall enjoy ourselves here, dear brother. Fetch wood, dear Lákshmana, good, hard wood, and build a place to live, for my heart is set on living here.” Hearing his words Saumítri, tamer of foes, went and brought different kinds of trees and built a leaf-hut.

Then Rama addressed him again, his single-mindedly obedient brother: “Bring flesh of a black antelope, and we shall offer sacrifice to our hut.” Powerful Lákshmana Saumítri killed a black deer, one pure enough for sacrifice, and then cast it into a well-kindled fire. When Lákshmana observed that it was cooked, well-broiled, the bleeding stanchd, he said to Rághava, tiger among men: “The black deer has been roasted black, with all its limbs intact. You may now sacrifice to the gods, my godlike brother, for you are proficient.” 50.15

Rama bathed and then, intently and with expertise, he intoned the prayers most skillfully and made a plentiful offering for averting evil. It was a charming leaf-thatched hut, well built in a suitable spot protected from the wind, and they all entered it together to take up their dwelling, as the hosts of gods enter their assembly hall Sudhárma. It was a splendid forest, too, teeming with many kinds of birds and beasts, where trees grew dense with brilliant clusters of flowers, and the cries of wild animals echoed. And they enjoyed themselves in perfect happiness there—all the while holding their senses under control. Now that he had 50.20 arrived at pleasant Mount Chitra-kuta and the River Mál-yavati, with its gentle fords where beasts and birds would congregate, Rama felt a gladness and delight that made him forget the sorrow of being an exile from his city.

RACKED WITH BITTER sorrow, Guha had stood talking 51.1 a long while with Sumántra until Rama landed on the southern shore, and then he returned home. Given leave to depart, Sumántra harnessed the splendid horses, and in profound dejection he proceeded directly to the city of A-yódhya. Fragrant forests came into view, streams and ponds, then villages and cities, but he sped past it all. Then, on the third day at dusk, the charioteer reached Ayódhya, and it was a dismal sight that met his eyes.

The city was silent and seemed deserted, and as he looked 51.5 at it in deep dejection, Sumántra was overcome by a rush of grief and anxiously asked himself: "Can it be that the entire city, with its elephants and horses, its people and their lord, has been consumed by the fire of grief, in sorrow for Rama's suffering?" Lost in these anxious thoughts, the charioteer hurriedly entered. But as the charioteer Sumán-tra was advancing, men began to run toward him by the hundred and thousand, asking, "Where is Rama?" He told them, "I took leave of Rághava at the Ganges. The great and righteous prince dismissed me, and so I returned. The three of them have crossed the river." When the people heard this, their faces filled with tears, they sighed, "Alas!" and cried out, "Oh Rama!" And he heard what they said as 51.10 they stood about in groups: "Now we are lost indeed, for we shall not see Rághava here again." "We will never again show ourselves at feasts or sacrifices, at weddings or great assemblies, since righteous Rama will not be there." "Like a father Rama watched over the city, pondering what was advantageous for the people, what would please them and bring them happiness."

Along the row of inner shops he heard the mourning of the women where they sat by their windows, suffering with grief for Rama. In the middle of the royal highway, Sumántra covered his face and went straight to Dasha-ratha's palace. Alighting swiftly from the chariot, he entered the king's compound and passed in turn through the seven courtyards, which were crowded with men of importance. 51.15

Here and there in the mansions he could hear the hushed comments of Dasha-ratha's wives, grief-stricken over Rama: "The charioteer went away with Rama and now has come back without him. What can he possibly say to Kausályā in her grief?" "As hard as it is for Kausályā to live, it must be, I guess, no easier to die, if she still lives despite her son's departure." Hearing the talk of the king's wives—and it was all too true—he quickly entered the palace that seemed engulfed in flames of grief.

He made his way through the eighth courtyard, and there in the pale white chamber he saw the king, desolate and anguished, tormented with grief for his son. Sumántra advanced to where the lord of men was sitting. Doing obeisance to him, he delivered Rama's message just as it had been told to him. The king listened in silence, and then, his mind reeling, he fell to the ground in a faint, overwhelmed by grief for Rama. Pain swept over the women of the inner chamber as the lord of the land grew faint. And as the king fell to the floor, they lifted up their arms and wailed. With Sumitra's help Kausályā raised up her fallen lord, and then she said: "Illustrious king, here is the messenger come from the prince who has done what no man ever did. He has returned from his sojourn in the forest. Why do you not 51.20 51.25 address him? Or are you at last ashamed, Rághava, of the calamitous thing you have done? Stand up, and set things right. Grief will render you no aid. Kaikéyi, for fear of whom you dare not ask the charioteer about Rama, is not here, my lord; you may speak freely.”

So Kausálya spoke to the great king, and then, sick with grief, she suddenly fell to the floor, the rest of her words drowned in her tears. When the women saw Kausálya fall lamenting to the ground and looked at their lord, they all broke out in shrill weeping. And as the din arising from the inner chamber reached them, men young and old alike and all the women broke out in weeping, so that once again every quarter of the city was thrown into confusion. 51.30

WHEN THE KING had revived and recovered from his faint, he summoned the charioteer to learn what had happened to Rama. The charioteer approached in desolation, his body coated with dust, his face bathed in tears—an old man deeply suffering like an elephant newly captured, and like the elephant heaving sighs, pensive and beside himself with grief. The king addressed him in deep anguish: 52.1

“Where is my righteous son living? Must he resort to the foot of a tree? Rághava has known every comfort, charioteer, what must he now eat? How can the son of the guardian of the earth lie down upon the earth like some helpless wretch? Foot soldiers, chariots and elephants used to follow Rama wherever he went. How can he have gone off to live in the desolate forest? Wild animals range through it, black snakes infest it. How can the two young men and Vaidéhi have gone to the forest? How could the princes and poor Sita, 52.5

so delicate a young woman, have alighted from the chariot, Sumántra, and proceeded on foot? You at least have found fulfillment, charioteer, in seeing my sons entering the forest as the two Ashvins might enter onto Mount Mándara. What were Rama's words, Sumántra, what were Lákshmana's and Máithili's when they reached the forest? Tell me, charioteer, where Rama sat, where he slept, what he ate."

So the lord of men pressed the charioteer, and in a sob- 52.10 choked and breaking voice Sumántra answered the king:
"Rághava cupped his hands in reverence and bowed his head, great king, and in perfect keeping with righteousness he said to me: 'Charioteer, in my name you must fall at the feet of my great and celebrated father, and pay him the homage he deserves. In my name, charioteer, you must ask the women of the inner chamber after their health, all of them without exception, and do obeisance to them according to rank. And you must ask my mother Kausálya after her welfare and do obeisance to her, saying, "My lady, ever venerate the feet of my lord as if he were a god." Ask 52.15 Bhárata after his welfare and tell him in my name, "You must observe proper conduct toward each and every one of our mothers." And tell him further, the great-armed prince, the delight of the Ikshváku House, "When you become prince regent you must defer to father, who remains the king." '

So glorious Rama spoke to me, great king, and as he did the tears rolled in a flood from his lotus-coppery eyes.
But Lákshmana was furious, and heaving a sigh he said,
'For what crime has the prince been exiled? Whether it was the granting of a boon or some other selfish motive that led to Rama's banishment, in any event an evil thing has been done. I can see no reason at all for Rama to have been abandoned. The banishment of Rághava was a rash act, a 52.20 perverse act of folly, that must provoke protest. I for one can no longer regard the great king as my father. Rághava shall now be brother, father, master and every kinsman to me. How could anyone in the world feel loyalty to you after doing such a thing, after abandoning the prince whom all the world loves and who is devoted to the welfare of all the world?’

Poor Jánaki stood heaving sighs, great king, motionless and oblivious as though a spirit possessed her. The glorious princess, who has never known adversity before, only wept 52.25 in her sorrow and could not speak to me at all. She gazed up at her husband and her mouth went dry, and as she watched me leaving she suddenly burst into tears. That is just how it been stilled. In the lotus ponds the lilies have closed their petals, lord of men, and the waters have grown turbid. The lotuses have withered, and the fish and birds have hidden themselves. Blossoms that grow in water, flowers that grow on land, and fruits have lost their familiar luster, and their fragrance is all but gone.

No one welcomed me as I entered Ayódhya. The men, not seeing Rama, heaved sighs incessantly. From mansions, many-storied buildings and palaces the women observed the chariot come, and they raised cries of woe, tormented at losing the sight of Rama. More anguished than ever before, the ladies looked at one another dimly, through large and once-bright eyes that rushing tears had overwhelmed. I could detect no disparity in the anguish felt by friends, enemies or neutrals. The people have lost all delight, the elephants and horses are desolate, the city wilts at the cries of anguish and reverberates with sighs, joyless and tormented by Rama's banishment. It almost seems to me, your majesty, as if Ayódhya, like Kausálya herself, had been bereft of her only son." 53.10

When he heard the charioteer's report, the king replied in a most desolate, sob-choked voice: "Kaikéyi, a woman of evil family and evil designs, forced me, and I failed to seek the advice of elders skilled in counsel. I failed to take counsel with my friends, my ministers and wise brahmans. It was on my own, in delusion, for a woman's sake that I did the rash thing I have done. Or perhaps—yes, surely charioteer, this great calamity was something destined to be, that had somehow to happen, to bring ruin upon this House. must bring Rama back to me at once—and hurry, for my life depends upon it. If only my express command might even yet make Rághava turn back! I shall not be able to live a moment without Rama.

But then, my great-armed son must have travelled far away by now. Then put me on the chariot and swiftly bring me within sight of Rama. Where is Lákshmana's eldest brother, the great bowman with pearly teeth? Oh please, I must see him and Sita if I am to live. If I cannot see Rama, those coppery eyes of his, those great arms, the jewelled earrings that he wears, I shall go to the house of Yama. What greater sorrow can there be than this, that in the state to which I am reduced, Rághava, the delight of the Ikshvákus, is not here for me to see. Oh Rama! Oh younger brother of Rama! Oh poor Vaidéhi! You did not know I would die helplessly in sorrow. Too wide, my lady, is this ocean of grief, too wide for me to cross alive. What misfortune to be denied the chance to see them, Rághava and Lákshmana, here and now when I so need to see them." Thus the glorious king lamented until suddenly he fell back in a faint upon the couch. Thus the king lamented over Rama before his mind went dark, and his words were so doubly piteous that as the queen, Rama's mother, listened, terror seized her once again. 53.20 53.25

TREMBLING CONSTANTLY AS though a spirit possessed her, Kausálya spoke to the charioteer from the ground where she lay almost lifeless. "Take me where Kakútstha is, and Sita and Lákshmana. I cannot bear to live here without them for even an instant. Quickly turn the chariot around and 54.1 take me as well to the Dándakas. If I cannot go after them, I will go to the house of Yama.”

The charioteer cupped his hands in reverence, and in a breaking voice choked by rushing sobs, he tried to comfort the queen. “Put away your grief and confusion, and your consternation over this sorrowful event. Rághava himself is living in the forest free from any sadness. Lákshmana, too, by humbly serving Rama in the forest, by his self-restraint, and sense of duty, is winning the higher world. Sita is making her dwelling in the forest, desolate place though it is, as if she were at home. She has entrusted her heart to Rama and is full of confidence and unafraid. I did not perceive that Vaidéhi felt any despair, not the slightest. She seemed to me almost accustomed to the hardships of exile. Sita takes the same delight in the desolate forests that she used to have when going out to the city gardens. The delightful Sita with her full-moon face is enjoying herself like a young girl, delighting in Rama and not at all despondent, in the desolate forest though she may be. For her heart belongs to him, and her life depends on him. Ayódhya itself, with Rama gone, would be far more of a wilderness to her.”

On the road Vaidéhi asks about the villages and cities she sees, the courses of rivers and the different kinds of trees. No journey or gusting wind, no distress or scorching heat can dim Vaidéhi’s moonbeam radiance. Sweet Vaidéhi’s face has not suffered any change; it still resembles the hundred-petalled lotus, still looks as radiant as the full moon. Her feet, radiant as lotus cups, remain as rosy as liquid lac even now, when she must do without it. Even now when she has

My great-armed son, like the banner of great Indra! Where must he be sleeping, with no pillow but his iron-hard arm? When shall I see Rama's perfect face again, lotus-hued, with hair so thick, his eyes like lotus petals, his breath scented like a lotus? Surely my heart is made of adamant; how otherwise, with him gone from my sight, would it not shatter into a thousand fragments? Even if Rághava should return 55.10 in the fifteenth year, he would spurn both the kingship and the treasury, since Bhárata will have possessed them. When a younger brother has had possession of the kingship like this, lord of the peoples, why would the eldest and best brother not disdain it? A tiger will not eat the food another beast has fed upon. In the same way the tiger among men will scorn what another has tasted.

One does not use again in a sacrifice the oblation, clarified butter, rice cakes, kusha grass or posts of khádira wood, once they have rendered their service. This kingdom, in like manner, will have no value for Rama. It will have been consumed, like a cup of wine drained to the lees, like a sacrifice when the soma has run out. Rághava will not suffer 55.15 an insult of this sort, any more than a powerful tiger suffers having its tail pulled. Such a man, a bull among men, with the power of a lion, the eyes of a bull! That his own father should destroy him, the way a fish destroys its offspring! If only you had kept to the age-old way of righteousness followed by the twice-born and set down in the sacred texts, before you exiled a son so earnest in righteousness.

A woman's first recourse is her husband, your majesty, her second is her son, her third her kinsmen. She has no fourth in this world. But you are no recourse for me, and Rama is off in the forest. I do not want to go to the forest; you have totally destroyed me. You have destroyed this kingship and this kingdom, and all the people of the city; you have destroyed your counsellors and yourself, destroyed me and my son! Your son and your wife should be delighted now." As he listened to the harrowing words she uttered, the king grew faint, overcome with sorrow. He plumbed the very depths of his grief, and there a memory was revived of something evil he once did. 55.20

SUCH WERE THE harsh words that Rama's mother in grief and anger forced the king to hear. And he was overcome with sorrow and fell to brooding. And as he brooded there suddenly flashed upon his mind an evil deed he had once done, unintentionally, long ago, when he was shooting arrows by the sound of the target alone. This grief and his grief for Rama were driving him out of his mind. The mighty lord of earth, consumed now by a double grief, said to Kausálya: "I beg your forgiveness, Kausálya! Here, I cup my hands in supplication. Always, even to strangers, you have been kindly and never cruel. And as you know, my lady, a woman who has regard for righteousness should hold her husband, whether he is virtuous or not, to be a deity incarnate. You have always kept to the ways of righteousness; you can tell good people from bad. Sorrowful though you are, you ought not to speak so unkindly to one more sorrowful still." 56.1 56.5

As Kausálya listened to the pitiful words the king uttered in his desolation, tears began to fall from her eyes like fresh rainwater down a runnel. And as she cried she cupped her hands like a lotus and raised them to her head before the king. Confused and alarmed, she spoke, the syllables racing one after the other: “Forgive me, I bow my head, I fall before you to the ground and beg you. It hurts me so that you should beg me, my lord, and you ought not to hurt me. She 56.10 is counted no real wife in this world or the next, my mighty lord, whose wise husband, deserving of her praise, must beg her forgiveness. I do know what is right, my righteous husband, I know you speak the truth. What I said was something uttered in the anguish of grief for my son. Grief destroys restraint, grief destroys all one has learned, grief destroys everything. No enemy is the equal of grief. An unexpected blow from an enemy’s hand might be withstood, but to withstand unexpected grief, however slight, is all but impossible. Only five nights all told have now passed with Rama living in the forest; but this grief that robs me of every delight makes it seem like five years. As I think about him 56.15 the grief grows here, in my heart, just as the waters of the ocean grow great with rivers ever rushing in.”

Such were Kausálya’s heartfelt words, and while she was speaking the sun’s rays began to fade, and evening came on. And the king, both gladdened by what Queen Kausálya said and overburdened with grief, yielded to sleep.

A SHORT TIME later, his heart crushed by grief, King Dasha-ratha awoke, and began to brood once more. Heartache over the exile of Rama and Lákshmana once more swept over him, the equal of Vásaṃ, as the demon's darkness sweeps over the sun. It was at midnight, on that sixth night since Rama's banishment to the forest, when King Dasha-ratha fully remembered the evil deed he had once done. He then addressed Kausálya, who lay anguished with grief for her son: 57.1

"Whatever a person does, be it good or evil, my dear and precious wife, he receives in like measure, the direct result of the deeds he has done himself. One deserves to be 57.5 called a fool who sets about a deed without understanding the gravity of its consequences, what he stands to gain or lose. A person who cuts down a mango grove and instead waters flame trees—made greedy for their fruit by the sight of their flowers—would be sorry when that fruit appears. I cut down a mango grove and watered flame trees instead. When the fruit appeared I had to give up Rama, and now, too late, I see my folly and grieve. When I was a young man, Kausálya, I earned a reputation as a bowman. It was said, 'The prince can shoot by the sound of the target alone.' But I did an evil deed, my lady, and it has now come home to me, this sorrow that I have brought upon myself. But just as a child might eat something poisonous out of ignorance, so I, too, was unaware of the fruits my shooting by sound would bear.

We were not yet married, my lady, and I was still prince 57.10 regent. The rains had come, the season that quickens lust and desire. After having drawn up the moisture of the earth and scorched the world with its rays, the sun had entered the awful region the dead inhabit. All at once the heat vanished, dark rain clouds appeared and all creatures began to rejoice—frogs, cuckoos, peacocks. Engulfed by the rain that had fallen and continued to fall incessantly, the mountain with its wild white cuckoos looked like one vast body of water. At this most pleasant of seasons I decided to take some exercise, and with bow and arrows and chariot I set out along the Sárayu River. I was an intemperate youth, eager to 57.15 kill a buffalo at the water hole in the nighttime, an elephant coming down to the river, or some other wild animal.

Now, in the darkness I heard a noise, beyond the range of vision, of a pitcher being filled in the water, but just like the sound an elephant makes. I drew out a shaft that glared like a poisonous snake. I shot the keen-edged arrow, and it darted like a poisonous snake.

And there, as day was breaking, the voice of a forest dweller rang out clearly, ‘Ah! Ah!’—the voice of a young man crying there as he fell into the water: ‘Why should someone shoot a weapon at a person like me, an ascetic? I came to the deserted river at night only to fetch water. Who has struck me with an arrow? What have I done to anyone?
 I am a seer who has renounced violence, who lives in the 57.20 wilderness on things of the wild. Why should someone take up a weapon to kill a person like me? The one burden I carry is my matted hair, my garments are nothing but bark cloth and hides. What could anyone stand to gain by killing me?

What wrong could I have done him? No, he cannot have had any purpose at all in what he did; pure malice must have prompted it. No one shall ever forgive him, like the man who violates his guru's bed. But it is not for the loss of my own life that I am grieving so. It is for two others I grieve that am slain, my mother and father. For they are an aged couple and have long been dependent on me. When I am dead what sort of existence are they to lead? My aged mother and father and I all slain by a single arrow! Who can have been so reckless, so malicious as to strike us down all at once?' 57.25

When I heard that piteous voice, I who had always striven to do right, I shuddered and the bow and arrow dropped from my hands to the ground. Desolate to my innermost being, in the depths of misery I went to the place and saw on the bank of the Sárayu an ascetic struck down by my arrow. He fixed me with his eyes—I was beside myself with terror—and he spoke these harrowing words as though ready to burn me up with his ascetic power: 'What harm have I, living here in the forest, ever done to you, your majesty, that you should attack me when all I wanted was to fetch some water for my elders? The very same arrow that has pierced me to the quick has also struck down two blind old people, my mother and my father. The two of them are frail and blind; they are thirsty and waiting for me. And now they will have to bear their parching thirst, as long as they can, on the strength of hope alone.' 57.30

‘I now see there is no reward for austerity or learning, since my father does not know that I lie fallen upon the ground. And even if he knew, what could he do? He is helpless and unable even to move about, as helpless as one tree to save another that is being felled. You yourself, Rághava, must go at once to my father and tell him, lest in his wrath he consume you as a raging fire consumes a forest. There is the footpath, your majesty, leading to my father’s ashram. Go and beg his forgiveness, lest he curse you in his rage. Draw out the arrow from me, your majesty, the keen-edged shaft is tearing me apart at the quick, as a rushing water current tears a soft riverbank apart. I am not a brahman, your majesty, set your mind at ease. For I was born of a vaishya father and a shudra mother, lord of the country.’ 57.35

So he spoke, in pain, and as he lay doubled over, I pulled out the arrow from where it pierced him to the quick. I stared at him lying there by the Sárayu, his body drenched in water, as he painfully lamented, all the while gasping from his mortal wound; and as I stared, my dear wife, I grew utterly sick at heart.”

“IT WAS A great sin I had committed, however unintentionally, I hardly had my wits about me as all alone I put my mind to the question of how might it be righted. At last I took the pot filled with pure water and went along the path he had told me of, until I reached the ashram. There I saw his parents, a frail, blind old couple with no one to guide them, like a pair of birds whose wings have been clipped. They could not move about and were sitting 58.1

there listless and helpless, talking about him, their one hope that I robbed them of.

Hearing the sound of my footsteps the sage spoke: ‘Why 58.5
did you take so long, my son? Bring the water at once. Your mother here was worried, my child, and all because you were playing in the water. Come into the ashram at once. If perhaps your mother or I have offended you in some way, my son, you should not take it to heart. For you are an ascetic, my child. You are the recourse for us who have no other, the eyes for us whose sight is gone. Our very lives are in your hands. Won’t you say something to us?’

The longer I looked at the sage, the more frightened I became, and in a choked voice, stammering and slurring the syllables, I spoke to him. With effort I managed to collect 58.10 my thoughts and recover the power of speech. Then I began to tell him the frightful story of their son’s calamity. ‘I am Dasha-ratha, a kshátriya, not the great one’s son. A sorrowful thing, which all good men would condemn, has happened by my own doing. Holy one, I came to the bank of the Sárayu, bow in hand, eager to kill some animal, an elephant perhaps, coming down to the water hole. There I heard the sound of a pitcher being filled in the water and, thinking it an elephant, I shot an arrow at it. I went to the riverbank and there I saw an ascetic lying on the ground with an arrow piercing his heart and his life ebbing away. Holy one, I was 58.15 aiming at a sound, meaning to kill an elephant. I released the iron shaft toward the water, and it struck your son. When the arrow was pulled out he went to heaven, then and there, grieving for both of you holy ones, lamenting your blindness. It was unintentional, holy one, it was an accident that I struck down your son. Whatever awaits me now may the sage forgive me!’

The mighty sage gasped when he heard these harrowing words, and broken with grief he spoke to me as I stood before him, hands cupped in reverence. ‘If you had not told me yourself of this impious deed, your majesty, your head would have instantly burst into a myriad fragments. If 58.20 a kshátriya intentionally commits a murder—and the murder of a forest hermit at that—it topples him from his place, be he Indra himself, the of the thunderbolt. But since this act was unintentional, and for that reason alone, you shall live. Were it not so, the entire House of the Rághavas, not just you, would cease at once to be. Take us, your majesty, to the place,’ he said to me. ‘We want to see our son now, to have one last sight of him, his body spattered with blood and his hide garments in disarray, lying on the ground unconscious, under the sway of the King of Righteousness.’ So all alone I led the sage and his wife to that place, and brought the deeply grieving parents near to where they could touch their son.

The wretched couple drew close, they touched their son 58.25 and collapsed upon his body. And his father cried out: ‘My son, don’t you love me anymore? At least have regard for your mother, then, righteous child. Why don’t you embrace me, my son? Speak to me, my tender child. Whom shall I hear late at night—how it used to touch my heart—so sweetly reciting the sacred texts or other works? And after the twilight worship, the ritual bath and offerings to the sacred fire, who will sit down beside me, my son, to allay the grief and fear that anguish me? Who will bring me tubers and fruit and roots, and feed me like a welcome guest—me an invalid, without leader or guide? And how, my son, 58.30 shall I support your poor mother, blind and aged as she is, wretched and yearning for her son? Stay! Don't, oh don't go, my son, to the abode of Yama. You may go tomorrow, with your mother and me to lend you strength. For we too shall soon be going to the house of Yama, bereft of you and left helpless in the forest, wretched and anguished with grief.

And then, when I see Vaivásvata, I will make this speech:
"May the King of Righteousness forgive me, but this boy is needed to support his parents."

'You were free of evil, my son, and were struck down by a man of evil deeds. By the power of this truth may you go straight to the worlds they win who fight under arms.
Proceed to the supreme state those heroes reach, my son, 58.35 who do not turn their backs in battle but die facing the foe.
Go, my dear son, to the state attained by Ságara, by Shaibya, Dilípa, Janam-éjaya, Náhusa and Dhundhu-mara. Go, my dear son, to the state awarded to all holy men for their Vedic study and austerities, to one who donates land, who keeps the sacred fires, who is faithful to his one wife; to those who make a gift of a thousand cows, who support their gurus, who lay their bodies down. For no child of this family ever goes to the state of the accursed.'

So he mourned there, wretchedly and without pause, and then with his wife he set about making the funeral libation for his child. But just then the sage's son appeared in a 58.40 heavenly form procured by his own good deeds, and for one brief moment he addressed these words of solace to his parents:

‘I have attained a high station because I took care of you. And both of you shall soon come into my presence.’ With this, the sage’s disciplined son ascended straightway to heaven upon a heavenly chariot of wonderful construction. The ascetic and his wife hurriedly made the libation, and as I stood before him, my hands cupped in reverence, the mighty sage said to me:

‘Slay me this very moment, your majesty; dying holds no terror for me. For I had but one son and you have taken him from me with your arrow. Since it was unintentionally 58.45 that you struck down my pure son, I will only lay a curse on you, though it is a grievous and very dreadful one: Just as I now sorrow over my son’s calamity, so you, too, your majesty, shall end your days grieving for a son.’

The words of the noble sage have thus come home to me, dear wife, for now I am to lose my life grieving for my son. If only Rama could touch me or speak to me now just once. How unlike me it was, my lady, to do what I did to Rághava. I cannot see you with my eyes, Kausálya, my mind is failing. Here, the messengers of Vaivásvata are here, hastening me on! What greater sorrow than this, that 58.50 in the final moments of my life I cannot rest my eyes on righteous, truthful Rama. They are not men, they are gods who in the fifteenth year will see Rama’s face again, that lovely face with flashing earrings. His eyes like lotus petals, his perfect brows, his perfect teeth and lovely nose: how fortunate the men who will see Rama’s face, so like the lord of stars, the moon. Like the autumn moon or a full-blown lotus, and so fragrant: how fortunate the men who will see the face of my defender. When Rama has ended his stay in the forest and returns to Ayódhya, what happiness for those who will see him, like the planet Shukra moving forward on its course. The grief arising here in my very soul has left 58.55 me helpless and insensible. In its wild rush it is sweeping me away, as a raging river sweeps away its bank.

Oh great-armed Rághava, the one relief of my agony!" With this last cry of grief King Dasha·ratha reached the end of his life. And so it came about, just after midnight, when 58.57 he had finished his mournful tale, that the lord of men, a man of noble vision, anguished by the exile of his beloved son and afflicted with the most profound sorrow, breathed his last.

NIGHT PASSED, AND next morning the panegyrists arrived to attend at the bedchamber of the king. The skillful servants approached as usual, women and eunuchs mostly, people of impeccable conduct. At the proper time and according to custom the bath attendants came, bringing golden pitchers of water scented with yellow sandalwood. And a group of women appeared, young maidens for the most part, bearing auspicious articles, refreshments and accoutrements. The women then assembled who waited in attendance on the bed of the Kósalan lord, and they went to awaken their master. They suddenly felt apprehensive about whether the king was indeed alive; a shudder convulsed them and they began to tremble like blades of grass that stand against the current. Then, as the trembling women looked more closely at the king, their apprehension of evil became a certainty. 59.1 59.5

The lovely women were desolate and sent up a shrill wail, like cow elephants in the wilderness when their bull is driven from his place. At the sound of their crying Kausálya and Sumíttra awoke at once and came to their senses. Kausál-ya and Sumíttra looked at the king and touched him. Then, crying out “O dear husband!” they collapsed upon the floor. The daughter of the lord of Kósala lay writhing upon the ground, coated with dust, her brilliance dimmed like that of a star fallen from the sky. A place of panic and bewilderment, with throngs of heartbroken people, tumult and crying everywhere, and kinsmen anguished with grief; all its bliss shattered in an instant, with a desolate and frenzied look—such was the palace of the god of men when he had 59.10 reached the end of his allotted span. Realizing that the glorious bull among kings had passed away, his wives gathered around him, weeping wildly and piteously in their sorrow, and stretching out their arms in helpless lamentation.

KAUSÁLYA GAZED at the dead king—he looked like a blazing fire suddenly extinguished, or the ocean emptied of water, or the sun gone dark—and her eyes filled with tears. Broken now with a double grief, she clasped the head of the king and cried out to Kaikéyi: “You should be satisfied, Kaikéyi, for now you can enjoy the kingship unchallenged. Wasn’t this the one object you had in mind when you forsook the king, you vicious, wicked woman? Rama has gone away without me, and my husband has gone to heaven. I am like someone left behind by a caravan and utterly stranded. I cannot bear to live. What woman who has lost her husband, her own deity, would want to live—except Kaikéyi, who has lost the way of righteousness as well? A greedy person is oblivious to risks; he will eat even fruit that makes one sick. And thus, at the instigation of the hunchback, Kaikéyi has destroyed the House of the Rághavas. 60.1 60.5

When Jánaka learns that the king, acting on an illicit order, has exiled Rama and his wife, he will suffer just as I do. Lotus-eyed Rama has gone away dead in life! And poor Sita, too, daughter of the king of Vidéha, she who has never known hardship, will tremble all over at the hardships of the forest. At night Sita will hear the ghastly cries of birds and beasts, and will shrink back into Rama’s arms in terror. Her father is aged and has but one child. He will fret over Vaidéhi. He, too, will be overpowered by grief and no doubt 60.10 lose his life.” As poor Kausálya lamented in the anguish of sorrow, her maid servants helped her up and led her away.

The ministers then took the lord of the world and placed him in a vat of sesame oil, and thereupon they assumed all the royal duties, as they were empowered to do. The counsellors, being prudent men, were reluctant to administer the final rites with no prince at court. And so for the meanwhile they kept watch over the lord of earth. When the women learned that the advisers had laid the lord of men in the vat of oil, they broke out in lamentation, crying “Oh he is dead!” Their faces streaming tears, weeping in their burning grief, they raised their arms up piteously and piteously lamented. Like a night without stars, like a woman bereft of her husband, the city of Ayódhya without its great king was cast into gloom. The people were drenched in tears, the housewives were crying woefully, the public squares and private courtyards were empty, and the brilliance the city once had was gone. As heaven has no light without the sun, as night has none when the crowds of stars have paled, the city went dark when it lost its great king, and sob-choked people crowded the streets and squares. Men and women had begun to gather in groups, and they denounced the mother of Bhárata. They were anguished and found no comfort in the city, now that the god of men was dead. 60.15

NIGHT PASSED, AND when the sun rose the deputies of the king, the brahmans, convened and went to the assembly hall. Markandéya and Maudgálya, Vama-deva and Káshyapa, Katyáyana and Gáutama and glorious Jabáli—these brahmans and the ministers all gave voice to their different 61.1

opinions. But in the end they turned to Vasíshtha himself, the foremost among them, the family priest of the king.

“The night passed sorrowfully for us; like a hundred years it seemed, with our king dead of grief for his son. The great king has gone to heaven, Rama has withdrawn to the wilderness, and glorious Lákshmana has gone with him. Both Bhárata and Shatrúghna, slayers of enemies, are in the land of the Kékayas, in the lovely city of Raja-griha, the home of Bhárata’s grandfather. Let some other Ikshváku prince be appointed king here and now, lest our kingdom be without a king and thereby meet with destruction. In a land without a king the rumbling lightning-wreathed clouds do not rain down their heavenly water upon the earth. In a land without a king handfuls of grain are not sown. In a land without a king no son submits to his father’s will, no wife to her husband’s. Where there is no king there can be no wealth; one cannot have a wife where there is no king. And there is yet further peril, for how can there be honesty where there is no king? 61.5 61.10

In a land without a king patrons take no delight in building assembly halls, lovely gardens or sanctuaries. In a land without a king the twice-born men who customarily sacrifice, the self-restrained brahmans rigorous in their vows, institute no sacred rites. In a land without a king no festivals or celebrationss are held, where actors and dancers come in troupes and which bring a kingdom prosperity. In a land without a king litigants receive no satisfaction, while storytellers find no favor with audiences by their stories. In a land without a king lovers and their ladies do not ride out to the countryside on swift horses. 61.15

In a land without a king the rich who live by farming and cattle raising do not sleep securely, with their doors wide open. In a land without a king merchants travelling long distances with loads of goods for sale do not go their way in safety. In a land without a king there wander no solitary, disciplined sages, those who lodge where nightfall finds them and contemplate the Self within themselves. In a land without a king security is not maintained: without a king the army cannot withstand the enemy in battle. Like rivers without water, like a forest without vegetation, like cows without cowherds is a kingdom without a king. 61.20

In a land without a king no one can call anything his own. For men, like fish, incessantly seek to devour one another. Atheists, too, who unscrupulously break all bounds, conform to decency only when royal punishment is there to check them. Ah, it would be like darkness, nothing at all remaining clear, were there no king in the world to separate good from evil. Even while the great king was alive it was your word alone we would not overstep, as the ocean does not overstep its shore. Best of the twice-born, consider what awaits us: without a king the kingdom will become a wilderness. Name some prince of the Ikshváku line and consecrate him yourself as our king." 61.25

WHEN HE HAD heard their speech, Vasíshttha replied to the brahmans and the hosts of ministers and allies. "Bhárata is living comfortably with his brother Shatrúghna in the city of Raja-griha, among his uncle's family. So let swift messengers go at once on speeding horses and bring back the two mighty brothers. Why do we delay?" "Yes, let them go," 62.1

they all replied, and when Vasíshtha heard their response, he said: “Come, Siddhártha, Vájaya, Jayánta, Ashóka, Nán- 62.5
dana. Listen, I shall tell you all what must be done. Take swift horses and swiftly proceed to the city of Raja-griha. You must keep your grief in check and tell Bhárata the following on my authority: ‘The family priest asks after your health, as do all the counsellors. Please hurry back, for there is urgent business to which you must attend.’ But do not go and tell him of this disaster that has befallen the Rághavas, do not tell him of Rama’s exile or the death of the king. Take silk garments and choice ornaments as gifts for the king and Bhárata, and depart at once.” Vasíshtha dismissed the messengers and they hurried off.

They crossed the Ganges at Hástina-pura after reaching 62.10 the country of Pañchála, and headed west, cutting through the middle of the Kuru jungle. They swiftly forded the Shara-danda, a heavenly river running with clear water, the home of birds of every description and thronged with people. They reached the venerable tree on the western bank, the heavenly Granter of Wishes, and after approaching it they entered the city of Kulínga. From there they arrived at Abhikála, passing on from Tejo-bhibhávana, and proceeding by way of central Bahlíka they made their way to Mount Sudámana. Soon the Foot of Vishnu came into view, and the Vipásha and Shálmali rivers. The road was long and their mounts exhausted, but the messengers pressed on with all haste to Giri-vraja, best of cities. To bring their master the 62.15 news, to ensure the safety of their master’s House and his succession in the dynasty, the messengers wasted no time but hurried on and reached the city late in the night.

NOW, THE VERY night the messengers were making their way into the city, Bhárata had a terrible dream. The son of the king of kings had this terrible dream just as night was ending, and it sorely troubled him. Observing how troubled he was, his affable companions tried to ease his distress by engaging him in conversation in the assembly hall. Some made music and sang, while others danced or staged dramatic pieces or told various kinds of jokes. But great Bhárata Rághava took no delight in the conviviality of his affable friends. One close friend questioned Bhárata as he sat in the midst of his friends: "Why are you not enjoying yourself, my friend, in the company of your companions?" Bhárata replied to his companion, "Listen to the reason why great desolation has come over me. 63.1 63.5

I saw my father in a dream. He was filthy, his hair dishevelled, and he fell from a mountain peak into a foul pool of cow dung. I saw him bobbing in the pool of dung, drinking sesame oil from his cupped hands, and he seemed to be laughing all the while. Then he was eating rice and oil, his whole body was anointed with oil, and again and again he would plunge head first into the oil. And in the same dream I saw the ocean gone dry and the moon fallen onto the earth. A blazing fire was suddenly extinguished, the earth was split open and all the trees dried up; the mountains smoked and crumbled. Then the king lay collapsed on a black iron throne; he was dressed all in black, and there were women mocking him, women part yellow, part black. And a righteous man, wearing red garlands and smeared with red cream, was hurrying off toward the south on a chariot yoked with asses. 63.10

This was the terrifying dream I had last night. Surely I myself, or Rama, or the king, or Lákshmana is going to die. For when in a dream a man sets out in a carriage yoked with asses, it is not long before a wreath of smoke appears above his funeral pyre. It is because of this I am so desolate and do not respond to your courtesies. My throat feels as if it were drying up; I can find no peace of mind. I feel a loathing for myself and do not know the reason why. Observing the course of this nightmare, with all those images that never before had entered my mind, and thinking about the king and that unthinkable look he had, I am filled with a great fear, and it will not leave my heart.” 63.15

AS BHÁRATA WAS telling his dream, the messengers on their weary mounts entered the lovely city of Raja-griha with its unbreachable defenses. They met with the king and the king's son and were received with honor. Then, clasping the feet of the king, they spoke these words to Bhárata: “The family priest asks after your health, as do all the counsellors. Please hurry back, for there is urgent business to which you must attend. Here is a gift for the king worth two hundred million, great prince, and one for your uncle worth a full hundred million.” 64.1

Bhárata accepted it all and in return honored the messengers with all that they might desire. He then asked, out of deep loyalty to his loved ones: “My father, King Dasharatha, fares well, I hope? Rama and great Lákshmana are in good health? And noble Kausálya, too, wise Rama's mother, who is earnest in righteousness, who knows the way of righteousness and ever looks to it? who knows the way of righteousness, the mother of Lákshmana and mighty Shatrúghna, she is in good health, I hope? And Kaikéyi, too, my ever selfish, hot-tempered and irascible mother, who fancies herself so wise?" So great Bhárata spoke, and the messengers most diffidently replied, "All fare well, tiger among men, whose welfare you desire." 64.10

At this, Bhárata addressed the messengers: "I will ask leave of the great king, telling him the messengers are pressing me to hurry." After speaking with the messengers and at their urging, prince Bhárata addressed his grandfather: "Your majesty, I must return to my father at the urging of the messengers. But I shall come back again whenever you may wish me to do so." So Bhárata Rághava spoke, and his grandfather the king kissed him on the forehead and addressed him with these heartfelt words: "Go, my child, I give you leave. Kaikéyi has a worthy son in you. Give your mother my best wishes, slayer of enemies, and your father. My best wishes also to the family priest, my child, and to the other chief brahmans and those two great bowmen, your brothers Rama and Lákshmana." 64.15

The king of Kékaya honored Bhárata with the gift of prize elephants, many-colored blankets and hides, and gave him riches. Two thousand gold ornaments and sixteen hundred horses were the riches he bestowed to honor the son of Kaikéyi. And straightway Ashva-pati presented Bhárata with his ministers as travel companions, estimable men, trustworthy and virtuous. His uncle gave him riches too: handsome elephants bred on Mount Irávata and Mount Indra-shira, and swift asses that easily took the yoke. He made him a present of dogs raised in the inner chamber, huge dogs 64.20 with fangs like spears and the strength and courage of tigers. Taking leave of his grandfather and his uncle Yudhájít, Bhárata boarded his chariot with Shatrúghna and set out. And servants yoked the camels, oxen, horses and asses to the circle-wheeled chariots, more than a hundred of them, and followed in Bhárata's train. So great Bhárata set out with Shatrúghna, under the protection of an army and accompanied by the ministers whom his grandfather trusted like himself. And he left Griha untroubled by enemies, as a perfected being might leave the world of Indra.

HEADING EAST, MIGHTY Bhárata, the majestic delight of 65.1
the Ikshvákus, departed from Raja-griha and crossed the wide and westward-flowing Shatádru, a deep river capped with waves. Crossing the river at Ela-dhana, he reached Ápara-párpata, proceeding on to eastern Shalya-kártana after crossing the Shila-vaha, the "river trailing stones." The prince, honest, majestic and ever true to his word, had the river in view until he passed the high mountains leading to the Chitra-ratha forest. Crossing the Kulínga, a deep and swift river bounded by hills, he finally rested his army upon 64.5 reaching the Yámuna. He rested the weary horses and cooled their limbs. Then, having bathed and drunk, he took a store of water and set out once more.

In his handsome coach the handsome prince passed through the vast, uninhabited wilderness as the wind passes through the sky. Traversing the southern end of Tórana, the son of Dasha-ratha reached Jambu-prastha and proceeded to the pleasant village of Varútha. He spent the night there in the pleasant forest and then went on, heading eastward to the garden of Ujjihána, thick with príyaka trees. But when he reached the príyaka trees, Bhárata took leave of the army, and, harnessing swift horses, he sped onward. He spent the night at Sarva-tirtha, and after crossing the Uttánaka and several other rivers on his mountain-bred horses, he arrived at Hasti-prísthaka, where he forded the Kútika. At Lauhítya the tiger among men crossed the Kapívati River, at Eka-sala the Sthánumati, and the Gómati at Vínata. 65.10

At Kalínga-nágara, Bhárata reached the forest of sala trees and drove on swiftly though his mounts were near exhaustion. He passed straight through the forest at night and at sunrise set eyes on Ayódhya, the city King Manu built. The tiger among men had spent seven nights on the road, and at last he saw before him the city of Ayódhya. From within the chariot he addressed his charioteer: “There is Ayódhya in the distance, that glorious white-clay city with its blessed gardens, throngs of virtuous sacrificers, brahmans who are masters of the Vedas, and prosperous subjects, all under the protection of the best of royal seers—but how unhappy it looks to me, charioteer. In the past one used to hear a loud, tumultuous sound in Ayódhya, of men and women all about, but I do not hear it now. At other times all the gardens revealed men leaving off the sports they had played since dusk and hurrying home. But now, abandoned by the lovers, the gardens seem to be weeping. It looks to me as if the town has become a wilderness, charioteer. Prominent men are no longer to be seen, as in the past, going in and out on carriages, elephants and horses. And I see various portents, ominous ones, evil and appalling, and my heart sinks at the sight.” 65.15 65.20

He entered by the Gate of Victory, his horses exhausted. The gatekeepers rose and with cries of “Long live the king!” accompanied him in. In bewilderment Rághava returned the gatekeepers’ greeting, and then addressed Ashva-pati’s weary charioteer: “We have heard how people looked in times past when they lost their king—and I see those looks here, charioteer, I see them all. The people I see in the town, men and women both, are unkempt, their eyes are filled with tears and they have a desolate look, haggard, forlorn and pensive.” So speaking to the charioteer, Bhárata proceeded to the palace, heartsick at the ominous sights in Ayódhya. As he gazed at the city that once looked like Indra’s city—at the empty crossroads, streets and houses, at the bars on the door-leaves red with dust—he was filled to overflowing with sorrow. There were so many things he saw that troubled his heart, things he had never before met with in the city, that great Bhárata hung his head, sick at heart and joyless, as he made his way into his father’s residence. 65.25

NOT SEEING HIS father there in his chamber, Bhárata went to see his mother in hers. When Kaikéyi saw that her long-absent son had arrived, she sprang up in delight, leaving her golden seat. As soon as righteous Bhárata entered his house he noticed that the royal splendor was absent, and so he clasped his mother’s lovely feet. She drew glorious Bhárata to her breast, embraced him and kissed him on the forehead, and then she began to question him: “How many days is it now since you left your grandfather’s residence? You must have flown along in your chariot. Are you not weary from the journey? Is your grandfather well, and your 66.1 65.5 uncle Yudhájit? Did you enjoy your visit, my son? You must tell me everything.” So Kaikéyi fondly questioned him, and lotus-eyed Bhárata, the delight of the king, told his mother everything.

“Last night was the seventh since I left grandfather’s residence. Mother’s father is well, and so is my uncle Yudhájit. The king, the slayer of enemies, gave me riches and precious objects, but they were an encumbrance, and so I left them on the road and came on ahead. The messengers who carried the order of the king urged me to make haste. Now I have something to ask my mother, and she must answer. This comfortable gold-worked couch of yours is empty. And the people of Ikshváku seem to me to have lost all delight. The king is usually here in mother’s chamber. I have not yet seen him and came here in hopes that I would. I should like to clasp my father’s feet. Answer my question, mother. Could he perhaps be in the chamber of my eldest mother, Kausályā?” 66.10

Infatuated by her lust for kingship, Kaikéyi replied to him—an artful mother to an artless son—announcing the grievous event as if it were good news: “Your father has followed the course all living creatures must follow.” When he heard these words Bhárata, an honest son of a righteous family, fell suddenly to the ground, shattered by the violence of his grief for his father. Enveloped in grief, sorrowing over the death of his father, mighty Bhárata lamented, his mind reeling in confusion. “This couch of Father’s used to look so lovely to me. It does not look that way today, with the wise man gone from it.” Seeing her godlike son fallen on the ground, anguished and grief-stricken, Kaikéyi tried to help 66.15

about on the ground. Then, shrouded in his many sorrows, he said to his mother: “I had imagined the king was going to consecrate Rama or perform a sacrifice, and so I made the journey in delight. How differently it has all turned out! My very mind is torn apart, that I shall never again see my father, who always strove so earnestly for my happiness and welfare. Oh mother, of what illness did the king pass away before I could return? How fortunate are Rama and all the others who were present to perform the last rites for Father. But surely the great and illustrious king does not yet know I have come. Otherwise my dear brother would hurry here and bend down to kiss me on the forehead. Where is that 66.25 hand so pleasant to the touch, the hand of my tireless dear brother, with which he would always brush away the dust from me? Have my arrival announced to him at once, to tireless Rama. That wise man is now father, brother and every kinsman to me, and I his slave. For in the eyes of a noble man who knows the way of righteousness one’s eldest brother is as one’s father. His are the feet I would clasp, for he is my only refuge now. But my lady, what did the truthful king, my father, say? I just want to hear what last message he might have had for me.”

So he questioned her, and Kaikéyi replied straightforwardly: "The great king, as good a man as ever lived, went to the next world lamenting, 'Rama!' and 'O Sita, Lákshmana!' And when at last the law of time caught your father up, the way a snare catches a great elephant, the last words he uttered were these: 'Fortunate the men who will see Rama when he comes back with Sita, and see great-armed Lákshmana when he comes home.'" Hearing this Bhárata became still more distraught, for he anticipated yet another calamity. With an expression of deep distress he questioned his mother further: "But where can the righteous prince have gone, the delight of Kausálya, with our brother Lákshmana and Sita?" Questioned thus his mother again answered straightforwardly. She promptly began to relate the grievous event, supposing it would be taken as good news: "My son, the prince went off in bark-cloth garments to the great Dándaka forest, with Vaidéhi and Lákshmana following after him." 66.30 66.35

Bhárata was alarmed when he heard this, for doubts had been raised about his brother's conduct. Concerned for the greatness of his dynasty, he began questioning her further: "Rama did not seize the wealth of any brahman, did he? He did not harm some innocent man, whether rich or poor? The prince did not covet another man's wife, did he? Why was he exiled to Dándaka wilderness like one who has slain an unborn child?" His capricious mother then began to tell exactly what she had done, and with the same feminine disposition that had made her do it.

“No, Rama did not seize the wealth of any brahman. He harmed no innocent man, rich or poor, and Rama would never so much as cast his eyes upon the wife of another man. It was I, my son. As soon as I learned of Rama’s consecration, I demanded that your father award you the kingship and exile Rama. Your father followed the proper course of action and did exactly that, and so Rama and Saumítri were sent away with Sita. His beloved son gone from his sight, the glorious protector of the earth was crushed with such grief for his son that he died. So now you must assume the kingship, as you know to be right. It was on your behalf I did all this, all that I could do. Therefore, my son, in concert with the chief brahmans—those who know the ritual precepts, under the lead of Vasíshta—you must at once perform according to precept the last rites for the courageous king, and then have yourself consecrated to power over the wide earth.”

WHEN BHÁRATA LEARNED that his father had passed away and his two brothers were in exile, he was consumed with sorrow and spoke these words:

“What possible use have I for kingship, stricken as I am and grieving, bereft of both my father and the brother who is like a father to me? You have heaped sorrow upon my sorrow, rubbed salt into a wound, by killing the king and making Rama an ascetic. Like the night of doom have you come to annihilate this House. My father had no idea he was holding a firebrand in his embrace. It will be a miracle if Kausálya and Sumítra survive this torture of grief for their sons—and all because of you, my very own mother! brother is righteous and knows the proper way to behave toward his elders, and surely his behavior toward you was perfect, just as toward his own mother. My eldest mother, Kausálya, far-sighted though she is, treated you like a sister in her adherence to the way of righteousness. And you have sent her accomplished son away in bark-cloth garments, to a life in the forest! Can you feel no grief, evil woman?

He is an accomplished and glorious hero who never contemplated evil. What possible purpose could you have had in sight to banish him in clothes of bark? Was it all for the sake of kingship that you brought about this great misfortune? In your greed, I suppose, you never understood how I felt toward Rama. With those tigers among men, Rama and Lákshmana, gone from my sight, by virtue of what power would I be able to guard the kingdom? The great and righteous king himself had great might, yet he would constantly retreat behind his mighty son, like Mount Meru behind its forest. What strength have I to bear such a burden? I am like a calf before a load only a great ox can draw. Even were I to acquire the power through stratagems or force of intellect, I would never grant you your wish—not you, a woman so blindly ambitious for her son. I will bring my brother back from the forest, the beloved of his people.” So great Bhárata spoke—and how hard his words struck, the very opposite of what she had hoped—and he roared out once more in the anguish of his grief, like a lion inside a mountain cave. 67.10 67.15

SO BHÁRATA REVILED his mother, and in the grip of a wild rage he addressed her once more: 68.1

“It is you who should be expelled from the kingdom, Kaikéyi, you vicious, wicked woman! And abandoned in accordance with all that is right, may you weep your eyes out without me. What possible wrong could the king or perfectly righteous Rama have done you, that because of you they should have found death and banishment both at once? You are guilty of murdering the unborn by your destruction of this House. May you go to hell, Kaikéyi, and never come to share the afterworld of your husband. That you could be capable of such evil and so horrible a deed—renouncing the beloved of all the world—makes me fearful on my own account as well. Because of you my father is gone and Rama withdrawn to the wilderness, and you have brought infamy upon me in the eyes of every living soul. 68.5

O enemy of mine in a mother’s guise, malicious woman lusting for kingship! Never speak to me again, depraved murderess of your husband! Kausálya and Sumíttra and the rest of my mothers are afflicted by great sorrow and it is all your fault, polluter of our House! You are no true daughter of Ashva-pati, a wise and righteous king, but a demoness born to lay your father’s House in ruins. Because of you righteous Rama, constant in his devotion to truth, has been driven to the forest, and father has gone to heaven in his grief. This evil for which you have striven falls upon my head: I am left without my father and abandoned by my brothers, to become an object of hatred to all the world. you attain now, evil-scheming creature? You can only go to hell. Are you not aware, cruel woman, that Rama—a man of restraint, the refuge of his kinsmen, the eldest son and his father's one equal—that Rama arose from Kausálya's very self? Limb from mother's limb is a son born, and from her heart. That is why she loves him so, because he is her very own, and not mere kin.

Once upon a time, the story goes, righteous Súrabhi, 68.15 the cow held in esteem by the gods, caught sight of two of her sons. They were plowing the broad earth, in a state of stupor. Seeing her sons upon the earth exhausted at mid-day, she wept in grief for them, and her eyes were flooded with tears. Clear and fragrant her teardrops fell, and they touched a limb of the great king of gods as he was passing below her. Indra, wielder of the bolt, saw how the glorious cow was consumed with grief, and the king of the gods was disquieted. He cupped his hands in reverence and addressed her: 'No great danger threatens us from any quarter, does it? What is the cause of your grief? Tell me, all-beneficent 68.20 cow.' So the wise king of the gods spoke, and Súrabhi composed herself and eloquently replied: 'Perish the thought! No, nothing threatens you from any quarter, overlord of the deathless gods. I am only grieving for two of my sons, who languish in their sorry plight. I see how haggard and desolate the oxen are, how the rays of the sun are burning them, and how the plowman beats them, overlord of the gods. They were born of my body, and for me to see them sorrowful and oppressed by burdens is agony. There is nothing so dear as a son.'

The wish-granting cow had countless sons and even so she grieved. How much more will Kausálya grieve, who must live without Rama? The good woman has but one son, and you have made her childless. For this you shall reap sorrow forever, both in this world and when you die. As for me, there is no question but that I must make full amends to my brother and father, and so restore our glory. I will have Kausálya's splendid son brought back and go myself into the forest where sages make their home." So he spoke, and with the look of an elephant in the wilderness driven with prods and goads, he fell upon the ground in a rage, hissing like a snake. His eyes bloodshot, his clothes in disarray, all his jewelry cast aside, the enemy-slaying prince lay fallen on the ground like the banner of Indra, Shachi's lord, when the festival is over. 68.25

AS GREAT BHÁRATA was crying out, the sound reached Kausálya, and she said to Sumíttra: “Far-sighted Bhárata, the son of that savage woman Kaikéyi has returned. I want to see him.” With this, she set out to Bhárata, her face drained of color and her garment filthy, trembling and almost insensible. But at that same moment Rama’s younger brother was setting out to Kausálya’s residence, accompanied by Shatrúghna. And when Shatrúghna and Bhárata saw Kausálya, they were overcome with sorrow. She dropped down, unconscious in the anguish of her sorrow, and they took her in their embrace. 69.1 69.5

Then, in deep sorrow, Kausálya spoke to Bhárata. “You lusted for the kingship and here you have it unchallenged—and how quickly Kaikéyi secured it for you by her savage deed. But what advantage did that cruel and scheming Kaikéyi hope to gain by driving out my son in clothes of bark to live in the forest? Why doesn’t Kaikéyi at once drive me out as well to where my son is staying, my glorious Hirán-ya-nabha? Then again, I should be happy to go to Rághava on my own, with Sumíttra to attend me and the sacred fires carried at our head. But no, truly it is up to you to send me there yourself, where my son, the tiger among men, is practicing austerities. For this vast kingdom is now yours; she has delivered it to you, with all its abundance of wealth and grain, all its teeming elephants, horses, chariots.” 69.10

As Kausálya lamented like this, shrouded in her many sorrows, Bhárata cupped his hands in reverence and addressed her: “My lady, why do you upbraid me? I am guiltless and knew nothing of this. You know how deep and enduring is my love for Rághava. May that man never come to think in harmony with the sacred texts who sanctioned my elder brother's going—Rama, the very best of men, who always keeps his word. May he come to serve the most wicked of men, may he pass urine facing the sun and kick a sleeping cow, he who sanctioned my brother's going. May the unrighteousness attaching to a master who forces an onerous task upon his servant without remuneration attach to him who sanctioned my brother's going. May the sin that beings incur in turning traitor to a king who has protected them like his own children be reckoned to his account who sanctioned my brother's going. May the unrighteousness attaching to a king who levies a sixth portion in tax without guarding his subjects attach to him who sanctioned my brother's going. 69.15

May the sin men incur who promise priests their fee at a sacrifice and then cry off be reckoned to his account who sanctioned my brother's going. May he never honor the code of the brave in battle where elephants, horses and chariots are crowding and weapons flying thick, he who sanctioned my brother's going. The subtle meaning of the sacred texts, which the wise impart with so much care, may the evil-hearted man forever lose who sanctioned my brother's going. May he eat milk-rice, sesame-rice, and goat's flesh to no purpose; may he show contempt for his gurus, the ruthless man who sanctioned my brother's going. May his children and wife and servants huddle about him at home while he alone eats delicacies, the man who sanctioned my brother's going. 69.20

May he be excluded at once, this very moment, from the deeds practiced by the good, from the praises of the good, from the world of the good, he who sanctioned my brother's going." In this way the prince tried to reassure Kausálya, bereft of her husband and son, and then, in the anguish of his sorrow, he collapsed. 69.25

They were heavy curses Bhárata had called down upon his head, and as he lay insensible and consumed with grief, Kausálya addressed him: "This sorrow of mine, my son, has grown only greater. That you should curse yourself with such curses chokes the very breath of life within me. Thank God, my child, that your own thoughts never swerved from righteousness any more than those of Lákshmana. If what you promise me is true, you shall attain the world the good attain." So great Bhárata lamented in the anguish of his sorrow, his mind in turmoil from all the confusion and besieged by grief. On and on he wildly lamented; he fell in a stupor to the ground; heaving deep sighs all the while he passed the night lost in grief. 69.30

AS KAIKÉYI'S SON Bhárata still lay consumed with grief, 70.1 Vasíshta, most eloquent of seers, came and eloquently spoke to him: "Glorious prince, I pray you, enough of this grief. It is time you performed the obsequies for the lord of men." Bhárata regained his composure on hearing Vasíshtha's words, and wise in the ways of righteousness he commenced the performance of all the funeral rites. The protector of the earth was removed from the oily liquid and laid upon the earth. His face had a yellowish tinge, and he seemed to be asleep. The son then had Dasha-ratha laid 70.5 upon a sumptuous bed encrusted with all kinds of gems, and he began to lament over him in deep sorrow.

"Why did you take this decision, your majesty, when I was away, before I could return, after sending righteous Rama into exile with mighty Lákshmana? Where are you going, great king, leaving your people in sorrow when the lion among men, tireless Rama, has already left them? Who is there, your majesty, to maintain the security of your city, now that you have gone to heaven, dear Father, and Rama has withdrawn to the forest? The earth has been widowed, your majesty; bereft of you it is cast into gloom. And the city looks to me like the night without a moon." So Bhá- 70.10 rata lamented, sick at heart, until the great seer Vasíshta addressed him once more: "The funeral rites must be performed for the lord of the people. Let it all be done fully, great-armed prince, and without delay." "So be it," Bhárata replied, heeding Vasíshta's command, and he urged all the sacrificial priests, the family priests and preceptors to make haste.

The sacred fires of the lord of men had been placed outside the fire-sanctuary, and the priests and sacrificers fetched them in accordance with the ritual precepts. Disconsolate and choked with sobs, his attendants raised the lifeless king onto a litter and bore him out. Ahead of the king went people strewing the way with gold and silver and different kinds of garments. Others brought sandalwood, aloe, balsam, pine, pádmaka and deva-daru wood and built a pyre. After placing various other fragrant substances on the pyre, the priests laid the protector of the earth in the center. The priests made offering to the fire and intoned prayers for him, while the chanters of the Sama Veda sang the hymns in accordance with the sacred texts. 70.15

In palanquins and carriages, according to their rank, his wives had come out from the city in the company of the elders. And as the flames engulfed the king and the priests walked leftward around him, the grieving women did likewise, with Kausályā at their head. At that hour could be heard a cry like the cry of curlews as the anguished women by the thousand raised their piteous wail. Afterward, amid uncontrolled weeping and constant lamentation, the women went to the bank of the Sārayu and alighted from their carriages. After making the funeral libation, the king's wives, the counsellors, the family priests and Bhārata tearfully reentered the city, where they sat upon the ground to pass the ten-day period of mourning. 70.20

WHEN THE TEN-DAY period was over, the prince purified 71.1 himself, and on the twelfth day he had the shraddha rites performed. To the brahmans he gave precious objects, money and abundant food—goat’s flesh and much white rice—and cows by the hundred. Male and female slaves, carriages and grand houses did the prince bestow upon the brahmans as the funerary gifts of the king. On the thirteenth day at the hour of dawn, great-armed Bhárata went out to perform the ceremony of purification at the foot of his father’s pyre.
 Again he was stunned by grief, and he began to lament. His 71.5 throat choked with sobs, he cried out in his deep sorrow: “Oh dear father, my brother Rághava, to whose care you committed me, is banished to the forest, and you have left me in an utter void! My king, my father, where have you gone? You have left mother Kausálya helpless, with her son, her one refuge, banished to the forest.”

And when he saw the ash-brown circle where the charred bones lay, the place where his father’s body had met extinction, he gave way to despair and cried aloud. He was desolated by the sight of it and fell weeping to the ground, the way a pole-banner in honor of Shakra might fall while 71.10 being fixed in place. His ministers all flew to the aid of the pious prince, just like the seers when Yayáti fell at his final hour. Seeing Bhárata overwhelmed with grief, Shatrúghna likewise fell senseless to the earth, fondly remembering the protector of the earth. He was nearly out of his mind, and like a madman he began to lament in his profound sorrow, recalling with every passing minute another of his father’s virtues.

“Churned up in all its fury by Mánthara, with Kaikéyi as its raging beast and the offer of the boon its overwhelming flood, a sea of grief has swallowed us! Where have you gone, dear father, leaving Bhárata to lament, a boy so delicate and young, whom you always treated so indulgently? Remember how you used to give us all so many delicacies to choose from, so many drinks, garments and ornaments—who will do that for us now? If the earth does not dissolve at once, though bereft of you, great and righteous king, it never will, not even at the hour of universal dissolution. With father gone to heaven and Rama withdrawn to the wilderness, what strength have I to live? I will enter a blazing fire. Bereft of my brother and father, I will not enter an empty Ayódhya that Ikshváku once protected. No, I will enter a grove of asceticism.” Hearing the brothers’ lamentation and reflecting on their calamity, the attendants were all afflicted with an anguish even sharper than before. 71.15

In despair and exhaustion, both Bhárata and Shatrúghna lay writhing on the ground like bulls with shattered horns. But their father’s family priest, the wise Vasíshta, maintaining his usual composure, helped Bhárata to his feet and said to him: 71.20

“There are three dualities to which every living thing without exception is subject. They cannot be avoided, and so you must not act this way.” Meanwhile Sumántra helped Shatrúghna to his feet, consoling him and sagely explaining how all living things are born and so must die. The glorious tigers among men stood up, but they both looked like banners of Indra ruined by the sun and rain. The sons wiped away the tears from their reddened eyes and mourned in 69.25

NOW, AS THE grief-stricken Bhárata was making the journey back, Lákshmana's younger brother Shatrúghna addressed him with these words: "Mighty Rama, the refuge of all creatures in sorrow, and of himself most of all, has been banished to the forest by a woman! And what of Lákshmana, the powerful, mighty Lákshmana? Why did he not free Rama, even if it meant deposing father? If he had fully weighed both sides of the issue, he would have deposed the king at the very first—a man who was under a woman's power and bent on an evil course." 72.1

As Lákshmana's younger brother Shatrúghna was speaking, the hunchback appeared at the front gate, all adorned with jewelry. She was anointed with essence of sandalwood and dressed in queenly garments, and with her many-colored belts and sashes she looked like a monkey tied up with rope. Catching sight of the hunchback, the cause of all the trouble, a gatekeeper ruthlessly seized her, at the same time calling to Shatrúghna: 72.5

"Here is the evil, malicious woman! It is her doing that Rama is in the forest and your father has given up his mortal body. Do with her as you see fit."

When he heard this the devoted and sorrowing Shatrúghna cried out to all the servants of the inner chamber: "This is the woman who has brought such bitter sorrow upon my brothers and my father. Let her now taste the fruit of her malicious deed." And with this, he violently seized 72.10

Her companions stared with wild consternation at the raging Shatrúghna and then fled in every direction. And they all took counsel together: “In the course of his mad attack he will annihilate us all. Glorious Kausálya is compassionate, generous and righteous. We must take refuge with her. She will ensure our safety.”

With eyes coppery red in his fury Shatrúghna, slayer of 72.15 enemies, dragged the howling hunchback over the ground. And as Mánthara was being dragged this way and that, her many-colored pieces of jewelry were shattered in fragments all over the ground. Scattered around the majestic palace the jewelry made it sparkle all the more, like the sky in autumn. In his rage, the powerful bull among men, still holding her in his powerful grip, cried out bitterly, heaping scorn on Kaikéyi. Shatrúghna’s bitter and sorrowful words plunged Kaikéyi even deeper into sorrow, and terrified by his threats she sought refuge with her son.

Bhárata glanced at her and called out to the raging Sha- 72.20 at the hunchback and began gently to soothe her as she lay anguished and stunned from Shatrúghna's abuse, staring like a trapped curlew.

ON THE FOURTEENTH day, at the hour of dawn, the 73.1 deputies of the king convened and addressed Bhárata. "Da-sha-ratha, our most revered guru, has gone to heaven, having first banished Rama, his eldest son, and mighty Lákshmana.
O glorious prince, you must become our king this very day.
Our kingdom is without a leader, and only by mere chance has it not yet come to harm. Your people and the guilds-men await you, prince Rághava, with all the materials for the consecration in hand. Assume the kingship, Bhárata, the 73.5 great office of your fathers and forefathers. Have yourself consecrated, bull among men, and protect us."

The devoted Bhárata reverently circled all the articles for the consecration and then made this reply to all the people: "It has always been the custom of our House that the kingship passes to the eldest son. You men are aware of this and ought not to ask such a thing of me. Rama, our elder brother, shall be the lord of earth. As for me, I will live in the wilderness for the nine years and five. Let a great army be marshalled, complete with all four divisions; for I myself will bring my eldest brother Rama back from the forest. And all the consecration materials standing ready 73.10 here I will carry in the vanguard as I go to the forest on Rama's behalf. Then and there I will consecrate Rama, tiger among men, and bring him back in the vanguard, like a sacred fire from the place of sacrifice. I will never grant this woman her wish, she who but faintly resembles a mother. I will live in the trackless forest, and Rama shall be king. Let a road be made by artisans, let the rough sections be levelled out, let guards accompany them, and men to scout out the trackless regions on the way.”

When the prince had ended this speech on behalf of Rama, all the people answered him with an earnest prayer for majesty: “May Shri of the Lotus ever attend you for what you have spoken here, for your willingness to bestow the earth upon the eldest prince.” 73.15

When the nobles heard the earnest words the prince uttered for all to hear, tears of joy for him welled up in their eyes and ran down their cheeks. The ministers and members of the council had listened joyfully to his words. Their grief was allayed, and they said to him, “On your orders, best of men, the devoted people and companies of artisans shall be given instructions concerning the road.”

NOW SURVEYORS and men trained in measurement, powerful excavators who were zealous in their work; engineers, laborers, craftsmen and men skilled in machinery; carpenters, road-levellers, woodcutters, well-drillers, pavers, cane-weavers and capable guides all set out from the city. Proceeding joyfully to the appointed region, that vast flood of people resembled the great rushing tide of the sea under a full moon. The skilled road-builders took their places each in his own contingent, and with all their different kinds of tools they set out bright and early. Through vines and creepers and shrubs, through stumps and boulders and all kinds of trees, the workers cut and built a road. In treeless areas some of them transplanted trees, while elsewhere some 74.1 74.5

set to work chopping with axes, mattocks and scythes. Others, stronger men, cleared the strong-rooted stalks of beard grass and the more impenetrable areas. Still others took dirt and filled dry wells and gaping holes, while some levelled out the tracts of land wherever it was too steep. Men then bridged the areas that needed bridging, pounded those that needed pounding and drained those in need of draining. 74.10

In no time at all they enlarged the volume and shape of many streams so that they looked like the sea, and they built various kinds of reservoirs embellished with benches. The road for the army was paved and whitewashed, lined with blossoming trees, sounding with the calls of flocks of wild birds; it was adorned with banners, sprinkled with sandalwood water, ornamented with all sorts of flowers, and it shone with the brilliance of the Milky Way.

Now, certain sites in the loveliest tracts where fruit grew rich and sweet were selected as rest areas for the great Bhárata. The superintendents, diligently following the orders they had received, gave orders to beautify these places with special ornamental work till they looked like perfect ornaments. Under auspicious constellations and at auspicious hours the experts laid the foundations for great Bhárata's rest areas. 74.15

The workers spread heaps of sand around the sites, built moats to encircle them, erected poles and crossbeams and bars. The sites were adorned with lovely lanes and garlanded with banners. Well-constructed thoroughfares ran through them all. And with their lofty, spire-topped mansions that seemed to wander lost in the sky, they resembled the city of Indra itself.

Where the royal road met the Jáhnavi—with its groves of 74.20 different trees, its cool, clear water and shoals of large fish—it sparkled like the clear vault of heaven at night when the moon and crowds of stars embellish it. It was a lovely road every step of the way, built by master artisans.

LATE IN THE night of Nandi·mukha, bards and genealo- 75.1 gists, masters of all the fine points of speech, came to sing the praises of Bhárata and wish him good fortune. Struck by golden drumsticks, the drum of the night watch resounded, while conches by the hundred and high- and low-pitched instruments were sounded. The loud sound of pipes seemed to fill the heavens, though it only brought more lacerating grief to the grief-stricken Bhárata. On awakening, he put a halt to the clamor, exclaiming, “I am not the king!” Then, turning to Shatrúghna, he said: “See, Shatrúghna, 75.5 what great wrong these people are doing because of Kai-kéyi. And King Dasha-ratha is gone, leaving me all these troubles. This royal majesty, founded on righteousness, belonged to him, the great and righteous king. And now it is adrift like a ship on the water without a helmsman.” So Bhárata wildly lamented, and as the women watched, they all broke out in piteous, shrill weeping.

He was still lost in lamentation as glorious Vasíshta, the authority in all matters of kingship, made his way to the assembly hall of the lord of the Ikshvákus. It was a lovely hall fashioned of gold and richly studded with jewels and gems, and it looked like Sudhárma as the righteous family priest entered with his attendants. The master of all the Vedas sat 75.10 down upon a golden bench covered with a costly spread and gave his instructions to the heralds. “Go at once and diligently fetch the brahmans, kshátriya, soldiers, ministers and commanders of the troops. There is urgent business to which we must attend.” Soon there arose a tumultuous din as the people began arriving on chariots, horses and elephants. And as Bhárata approached, the subjects called out their greetings to him just as they used to greet Dasha-ratha, the way the deathless gods greet Indra, lord of the hundred rites. The hall was like a pool filled with gems and shells and pebbles, its waters still despite the teeming fish and serpents. And the son of Dasha-ratha lent it such beauty as it had in the past, when Dasha-ratha himself was there.

toward Bhárata, the assembly hall appeared to the wise Vasishta like a night when the moon is full. As the nobles took their seats according to custom, the hall looked like a full-moon evening when the clouds have vanished. Observing that all the king’s subjects were represented in full, the family priest, knowing the ways of righteousness, commenced this gentle address to Bhárata: “My son, King Dasha-ratha went to heaven in the performance of righteousness, after making over to you this prosperous land abounding in wealth and grain. Rama likewise held fast to truth, mindful of the 76.5 righteous ways that good men follow. He could no more cast aside his father’s command than the rising hare-marked moon its light. Your father and brother have bestowed on you unchallenged kingship. You must take possession of it and gladden the ministers. Have yourself consecrated at once. Let the sovereigns of the north and west and south, and the westernmost ones who live by the sea, deliver up untold riches to you.”

Hearing these words, Bhárata was overwhelmed with grief. Knowing what was right and anxious to abide by it, he turned his thoughts to Rama. With words unclear because of his sobbing and in a voice like the call of the gray goose, the young prince began to lament and to rebuke the family priest in the midst of the assembly:

“The kingship belongs to that wise prince who has practiced chastity, perfected his knowledge, and always striven for righteousness. How would a person like me dare seize it from him? How could a son born of Dasha-ratha usurp the kingship? The kingship, and I myself, belong to Rama. Please see to it that your advice is in keeping with righteousness. Righteous Kakútstha, the eldest son and the best, the equal of Dilípa and Náhusa, must obtain the kingship just as Dasha-ratha did. The other course is an evil one, followed only by ignoble men, and leading to hell. Were I to take it I should become a blot on the House of the Ikshvákus in the eyes of all the world. I do not condone the evil deed my mother has done. Though I am here and he in the trackless forest, I cup my hands in reverence and bow to him. I will go after Rama—he is my king, the best of men. Rághava deserves not only this, but kingship over all three worlds!”

When they heard these righteous words, the men of the assembly, whose thoughts were ever with Rama, all shed tears of joy. “If I cannot bring my noble brother back from the forest, then in that very forest will I stay, just like my noble brother Lákshmana. I will use every means in my power to

With this, righteous Bhárata, who so cherished his brother, turned to the skillful counsellor Sumántra standing by his side and said: “Make haste and go, Sumántra! On my authority muster the army at once and give the command for the expedition.” So great Bhárata spoke, and Sumántra went off in delight and gave all the orders as he had been directed and had hoped to do. The subjects and the marshals of the army were delighted to receive the command for an expedition to bring Rághava back. The soldiers’ wives, too, when they learned of the expedition, were all delighted, and in each and every house they pressed their husbands to hurry. The marshals rallied the entire army, the soldiers, the horses, the fast ox carts and the chariots swift as thought. Bhárata saw that the army was ready as he stood in the midst of his gurus. Turning to Sumántra, who was at his side, he said, “Hurry and bring my chariot.” He received Bhárata’s command in great delight and came forth with a chariot harnessed with splendid horses. 76.20 76.25

Bhárata Rághava was a courageous prince who held fast to truth and strove to act truthfully. His glorious guru was away in the great wilderness, and he was ready to go and beg his forgiveness. The words he spoke were fitting when he said: “Make haste, Sumántra, and go to the leaders of the army to have the troops marshalled. Rama is in the forest, and I mean to beg his forgiveness and bring him back for the welfare of the world.” So Bhárata duly commanded the charioteer, and thereby answered Sumántra’s every wish. He gave instructions to all the leading subjects, to the heads of

his excellent chariot and set forth swiftly, eager to see Rama. Before him went all the counsellors and family priests in horse-drawn chariots that resembled the chariot of the sun. Nine thousand elephants marshalled according to precept followed Bhárata, the delight of the House of the Ikshvákus, as he went. Sixty thousand chariots and archers with every sort of weapon followed the glorious prince Bhára- 77.5 ta as he went. One hundred thousand horses, each with a rider, followed the glorious prince Bhárata Rághava as he went. Kaikéyi, Sumítra and glorious Kausályá travelled in a resplendent carriage, delighted to be bringing Rama back.

Throngs of nobles went along in hopes of seeing Rama and Lákshmana. With delight in their hearts, they held animated conversation about him: “When shall we see Rama, rain-cloud-dark, great-armed Rama, steady of courage and firm of vows, who allays the grief of the world?” “For the mere sight of Rághava will dispel our grief, as the rising sun dispels the darkness of all the world.”

The men of the city carried on such heartfelt conversa- 77.10 tion as this and embraced each other as they made their way along. Every estimable subject, the merchants and all the others, set off in delight to find Rama. Jewellers and master potters, weavers and weapon-smiths, workers in peacock feathers, sawyers, bauble-makers, gem-cutters, workers in ivory, plasterers, perfumers, renowned goldsmiths, blanket-cleaners, bath attendants, valets, physicians, incense-mer-

And thousands of brahmans all together, masters of the Vedas esteemed for their conduct, followed Bhárata in their oxcars as he went. Everyone was handsomely attired in clean clothing and anointed with pure coppery cream, and on a great array of vehicles they slowly followed Bhárata.

Delighted and cheerful the attendant army followed Kaikéyī's son Bhárata, and soon it came to a halt. Observing the army stop, and seeing the gracious waters of the Ganges, Bhárata addressed all his advisers with these well-spoken words: "Have my army pitch camp anywhere it chooses. 77.20 Straightway tomorrow, when we are rested, we shall cross the great river. As for myself, I wish to go down to the river and offer water to the departed king as part of his obsequies." So he spoke, and all together the ministers replied with a word of assent. Then they ordered each group to pitch camp separately and wherever they pleased. When the army, magnificent with its equipment all arrayed, was encamped along the great River Ganges, Bhárata took up his dwelling and began to ponder how to bring great Rama back.

NOW, THE KING of the Nishádas, seeing the bannered 78.1 army encamped along the River Ganges, hurried off at once to speak with his kinsmen. "A great army has appeared here, as vast as the sea. I cannot imagine what its purpose might be, however much thought I give it. There is a huge standard upon a chariot, marked with a kovidára tree. Has someone come to take us fishermen captive, or to kill us? Or is it perhaps Bhárata, Kaikéyī's son, marching out to slay Rama Dasha-rathi, whom his father has exiled from the kingdom? Rama Dasha-rathi is both my master and my friend. We must champion his cause. Arm yourselves and take up positions here on the bank of the Ganges. All the fishermen are to take up positions along the River Ganges. Guard the river with your troops, provisioning yourselves with meat, roots and fruit. Let the younger fishermen,” he exhorted them, “arm themselves and take up their positions, a hundred each on five hundred boats. But should it turn out that Bhárata is not ill-disposed toward Rama, this army of his may safely cross the Ganges today.” 78.5

With this, Guha, overlord of the Nishádas, took gifts and fish, meat and wine, and went forth to meet Bhárata. The valiant charioteer observed him approaching, and with the deference in which he was practiced he informed Bhárata. “Here is the chief with a large escort of kinsmen. He is an old friend of your brother’s and knows the Dándaka wilderness well. Let Guha then come to see you, Kakútstha. The overlord of the Nishádas will undoubtedly know where Rama and Lákshmana are.” When Bhárata heard Sumántra’s just words, he replied, “Have Guha come to see me at once.” 78.10

Guha was delighted to receive permission, and escorted by his kinsmen he humbly advanced before Bhárata and spoke: “This region is your pleasure garden. You caught us here quite unawares. But we all bid you a welcome stay among our tribe of fishermen. Here are roots and fruit provided by the Nishádas, meat both fresh and dried and a great variety of forest fare. I hope your army will spend the night here—we shall supply it well with food. Then tomorrow, 78.15

high-minded Bhárata made this reasoned and purposeful reply: “Dear friend of my guru, you have, in fact, already fulfilled my greatest wish, in that you are willing all on your own to show hospitality to such an army as mine.”
Such were the earnest words of mighty, majestic Bhárata.
And once again he addressed Guha, overlord of the Nishádas. “What way do I take, Guha, to go to Bharad·vaja’s ashram? This region is densely forested and the lowlands by the Ganges are hard to traverse.” When he heard the 79.5 words of the wise prince, Guha the forest-dweller cupped his hands in reverence and replied: “The fishermen shall go with you, alert and armed with bows, and so will I, glorious prince. But you are not setting out with ill will toward tireless Rama, are you? This great army of yours somehow arouses my suspicions.”

Thus Guha addressed him, and Bhárata, who was pure as the sky, replied in an even voice: “May the hour that brings such disaster never come! Please, harbor no suspicions about me. For Rághava is my eldest brother and like a father to me. I am setting forth to bring back Kakútstha, who is living 79.10

His face beamed with joy when he heard what Bhárata said, and joyfully he replied to Bhárata: “How blessed you are! I know of no one to equal you on the face of the earth. For although the kingship came to you effortlessly, you are prepared to give it up. You are prepared to bring back Rama when he is in such a plight, and for this you shall win everlasting fame throughout the worlds.”

As Guha and Bhárata were conversing in this fashion, the sun’s light began to fade, and night closed in. After 79.15 their army was encamped and Guha had provided for them generously, majestic Bhárata and Shatrúghna went to bed. But grief brought on by anxious thoughts of Rama troubled great Bhárata—and how little such a man deserved it, one who had always kept his eyes fixed on the way of righteousness. Rághava was consumed with a searing inner blaze; it was like the flame hidden within a tree that a forest fire has scorched. From the fire of grief he broke out in sweat, and the sweat poured down his every limb, like the icy water Himálaya pours down when the sun’s rays heat it. The son of Kaikéyi was crushed under a great mountain of sorrow, with its deep gorge of brooding, its minerals of heaving 79.20 sighs, thickets of desolation, numberless creatures of delirium, plants and rushes of misery, and peaks of grief, care and woe. And so high-minded Bhárata, wakeful and utterly distraught, came out with his people to meet with Guha, and again Guha offered him solace over his elder brother.

GUHA THE FOREST-DWELLER then began to describe to the exalted Bhárata the fidelity of great Lákshmana. "When virtuous Lákshmana was keeping his vigil, mounting close guard over his brother, his splendid bow and arrows in his hands, I said to him: 80.1

'Here is a comfortable bed, my friend, made ready on your behalf. Lie down and rest in comfort upon it, delight of the Rághavas. My people are all used to such pains; you are used to comfort. Righteous prince, we will stay awake and stand guard over him. There is no one on earth dearer to me than Rama, do not be anxious. Would I speak a lie to your face? Whatever hope I may have in this world for great glory, for the full acquisition of righteousness or of simple wealth, I have by reason of his grace. And I for my part, bow in hand and with all my own kinsmen, will protect my dear friend Rama as he lies asleep with Sita. I have wandered the forest all my life, and nothing happens here without my knowing of it. Moreover, we are prepared to withstand in battle even an army of four divisions.' 80.5

When we had addressed him in this way, great Lákshmana entreated us all, with righteousness alone in view: 'How, while Dasha-rathi is lying on the ground with Sita, could I find sleep—or any happiness in life? Look at him, Guha, reposing with Sita on the grass, a man whom all the gods and ásuras could not withstand in battle. This is the only one of Dasha-ratha's sons to resemble him in every trait; a son obtained by means of great austerities and all kinds of heavy labors. With him in banishment the king will not long remain alive. The earth will surely soon be widowed. The women must have cried out their last great cries and 80.10 ceased in exhaustion. The din has surely ceased by now in the king's palace.

I have little hope that Kausálya, the king or my mother 80.15 will live out this night. Even if my mother should live through it to look after Shatrúghna, Kausálya is so sorrowful that she, who bore this one heroic son, will perish.
And my father, who never got the wish that just eluded him, who never installed Rama in the kingship, will perish, too.
And when that moment comes, when father passes away and they purify the lord of the land with all the rites for the dead, they will have attained their object. Then they will stroll at their ease through my father's capital, through its lovely squares and well-ordered thoroughfares; with its mansions and palaces, adorned with every precious object; with 80.20 its teeming elephants, horses, chariots; sounding with the sound of pipes, stocked with every luxury, thronging with delighted and prosperous people, dotted with orchards and gardens, a place of crowded fairs and festivals. If only we might happily return when this period is over, to find him well and his promise fulfilled.'

So the night passed with the great prince standing there mourning like this. At daybreak, when the sun grew bright, the two of them matted their hair and went down to the bank of the Bhagi-rathi, where I had them comfortably ferried across. Their hair matted, dressed in garments of bark, 80.25 carrying splendid arrows, bows and swords, the two princes, slayers of enemies, powerful as bull elephants, glanced back often as they left with Sita."

As soon as he heard Guha's painful words, Bhárata was 81.1 plunged into agonizing thought. That delicate young man, so courageous and handsome, with the shoulders of a lion, great arms and large lotus-shaped eyes, recovered for a moment, but then in profound distress he suddenly collapsed, like an elephant pierced near the heart by goads. Seeing Bhárata in this state, Shatrúghna came close to him, and as he clasped him in his embrace he wept aloud, grief-stricken and nearly insensible. All of Bhárata's mothers flew to him 81.5 then, women already haggard from fasting, desolate and tortured by the calamity that had befallen their husband.

They cried as they gathered around him where he lay fallen on the ground. But Kausálya was most distraught; she edged close to him and clasped him in her embrace.
 As a loving cow might nuzzle her calf, the poor woman nuzzled Bhárata. Weeping and sick with grief she asked:
 "My son, you have no illness, have you, that gives your body pain? The life of this royal House now depends on you. To see you, my son, gives me strength to live, with Rama and his brother gone. Now that King Dasha-ratha has departed you are our only defender. You have not heard 81.10 any bad news, have you, about Lákshmana or my son—the only son I have—who has gone to the forest with his wife?"
 After a moment glorious Bhárata revived and, still weeping, he reassured Kausálya. Then he said to Guha: "Where did my brother, Sita and Lákshmana spend the night? What bed had they to sleep on, what did they eat? Tell me, Guha."

Thus questioned, Guha, overlord of the Nishádas, told Bhárata what sorts of refreshments he had provided for Rama, his dear and kindly guest. “I offered a variety of foods in great quantity for Rama’s meal, cooked food and fruit of different sorts. But the truthful Rama refused it all. He heeded the code of kshátriya and would not accept it. ‘It is not for us to take, my friend. Ours is always to give’ were the words with which great Rama entreated us, your majesty. Glorious Rághava only drank water, which Lákshmana drew for him, and both he and Sita then fasted. Lákshmana had a little of the water that was left over, and all three, silently and intently, performed the evening worship. 81.15

Afterward, Saumítri himself fetched some straw and quickly made a lovely bed for Rághava. Then Rama lay down with Sita upon the pallet, and after washing their feet, Lákshmana withdrew. It was at the foot of the almond tree over there, upon that very grass that the two of them, Rama and Sita, slept that night. Lákshmana, however, the slayer of enemies, strapped on palm-guards and finger-guards, bound upon his back a pair of quivers filled with arrows, and holding his great bow strung and ready he stood nearby the whole night through. I then grasped my great bow and arrows, and with my never-tiring kinsmen similarly armed I came and took up my position by Lákshmana, to stand guard over the man who is the equal of great Indra.” 81.20

the ground is where the great man slept that night. Here are the imprints he made.

Rama is a son of Dasha-ratha, that wise and illustrious king, and scion of an illustrious House. He should not have had to sleep on the bare earth. The tiger among men used to sleep on a pile of choice spreads overspread with furs. How is it possible that he slept on the naked ground? Before, 82.5 he always slept in the finest palaces, mansions and summer houses with inlaid floors of gold and silver, amid a profusion of choice spreads, dazzling with bouquets of flowers, scented with sandalwood and aloe—rooms that looked like white clouds, where flocks of parrots whistled. He woke to the sound of singing and musical instruments, the tinkle of gorgeous ornaments, and the roll of splendid bass drums. And panegyrists came at their appointed hour, and a crowd of bards and genealogists, to greet the slayer of enemies with well-suited verses and songs of praise.

No one in the world would ever have believed this; it does not seem at all real to me. Have I lost my wits? Or no, I am certain I must be dreaming. Surely no divine power 82.10 is mightier than Fate, if Rama Dasha-rathi and his beautiful, beloved Sita, the daughter of the king of Vidéha, the daughter-in-law of Dasha-ratha, had to sleep on the ground. This is my brother's bed; this is where he tossed and turned upon the hard surface, crushing all the straw with his limbs. I guess Sita fell asleep on this bed that night dressed in all her jewelry, for here and there you can see bits of gold adhering. Clearly she must have caught her upper garment here that night, for silken threads can be seen adhering still.

Perhaps to sleep beside her husband brings such pleasure 82.15 that poor Máithili, delicate child though she is, felt no pain.
 But Rághava was born in a House of emperors; he brings comfort to all the world and is prized by all the world, and he gave up the highest prize, the kingship. Handsome, red-eyed, lotus-dark Rághava was destined for pleasure and deserves no pain. How could he sleep on the ground? Vaidéhi truly has attained her highest goal by following her husband to the forest. But we, who are bereft of the great man, are all thrown into jeopardy. The world has lost its helmsman, and how empty it seems to me, with Dasha-ratha gone to heaven and Rama withdrawn to the wilderness.

And yet, no one even thinks to advance against our 82.20 treasure-laden land, for the might of his arms protects it still, even though he is living in the forest. Though the guardposts on the ramparts of the capital stand empty, though the horses and elephants have grown unruly, the city gates stand wide open and the army is demoralized; though the capital is unprotected, weakened and vulnerable in its plight, our enemies dare not covet it, like food prepared with poison.

From this day forward I will sleep on straw spread upon the ground, eat nothing but fruit and roots, and wear bark garments and matted hair. On his behalf I will live with pleasure in the forest for what time remains, taking his promise upon myself. No falsehood will attach to him. As 82.25
 I live there on my brother's behalf, Shatrúghna shall live with me, while my noble brother protects Ayódhya with Lákshmana. And in Ayódhya the brahmans shall consecrate Kakútstha. If only the gods allow this wish of mine to come true! I will bow my head and beg Rághava's grace myself in

IT WAS IN that very place, on the bank of the Ganges, 83.1 that Bhárata Rághava passed the night. He rose at daybreak and addressed Shatrúghna: “Arise, Shatrúghna, why do you lie asleep? Please fetch Guha at once, the overlord of the Nishádas. He will ferry the army across.” “I am awake,” Shatrúghna replied when his brother accosted him. “I am not sleeping but only musing, just like you, on my noble brother.” While the lions among men were conversing in this fashion, Guha paid a timely visit to them. He cupped his hands in reverence and said to Bhárata: “I trust you 83.5 spent a comfortable night on the riverbank, Kakútstha, and that all is well with you and your army.” Hearing Guha’s affectionate inquiry, Bhárata answered, subordinating all other considerations to Rama: “Yes, we passed the night comfortably, your majesty. You have shown us honor. Now let your fishermen ferry us across the Ganges in their many boats.”

Upon hearing Bhárata’s instructions, Guha hurried back to the settlement and addressed his kinsmen: “Arise, wake up, my blessings on you ever. Haul down the boats, and let us ferry the army across.” So he spoke, and they arose in haste 83.10 and, on instructions from their king, gathered five hundred boats from every direction. Some of them were fine ones distinguished by swastikas and fitted out with large bells, lovely well-built sailboats that easily caught the wind. Guha brought up such a boat, distinguished by a swastika and covered with a white carpet, a beautiful boat that gave out sounds of festive music. Bhárata boarded it with mighty Shatrúghna, Kausályā, Sumitra and the other wives of the king. Before the women came the family priest and the brahman gurus, next the wives of the king, and then the wagons and supplies. As the men loaded equipment, fired the camp, and began plunging into the ford, the noise rose up to the highest heaven. 83.15

The sailboats, manned by the fishermen, flew swiftly along, transporting the people on board. Some boats were laden with women, others with horses, while still others transported the vehicles and teams and the great treasures. On reaching the farther bank, the fisherfolk helped the people disembark, and as they returned they sailed their boats in lovely formations. The caparisoned elephants were urged on by their drivers, and, making the crossing, they looked like flag-topped mountains. Only some of the people were able to board the boats; others crossed on rafts, in tubs or barrels, while still others had only their arms to use. The auspicious army, ferried over the Ganges by the fishermen, struck out at the hour of Mitra for the great forest at Prayāga. Thus did great Bhárata allow his army to encamp at its pleasure and to rest, and then he set out in the company of his priests to visit Bharad-vaja, preminent among seers. 83.20

WHEN THE BULL AMONG MEN spied the ashram of Bharad-vaja only a few miles away, he brought the whole army to a halt and proceeded with his counsellors. Knowing the ways of righteousness as he did, he laid aside his weapons and equipment, and, dressed in a pair of linen garments, he 84.1

proceeded on foot, with the family priest Vasíshtha ahead of him. When he caught sight of Bharad-vaja, Rághava halted his counsellors and advanced behind the family priest. The moment Bharad-vaja saw Vasíshtha, the great ascetic sprang from his seat, calling to his students, "The welcome offering!" Bhárata then did obeisance to him. Since he had come 84.5 in the company of Vasíshtha, the mighty seer knew him to be a son of Dasha-ratha. He gave the two of them the welcome offering and water for their feet, and afterward fruit. Wise in the ways of righteousness he asked them in due order after the welfare of their House, of Ayódhya, their army, treasury, allies and counsellors. But knowing that Dasha-ratha had passed away he did not mention the king.

Vasíshtha and Bhárata asked him after the well-being of his body, his sacred fires, his trees, students, birds and beasts. Bharad-vaja assured them all were well, but then, in his abiding affection for Rághava, the great ascetic addressed Bhárata:

"What is your business in coming here when you should 84.10 be ruling the kingdom? Explain this to me fully, for my mind is unclear on it. The son Kausálya bore, a slayer of enemies and the one source of her delight, has been banished for a long time to the forest with his wife and brother. I am told that his father, acting on the orders of a woman, ordered the glorious prince to become a forest hermit for fourteen years. I trust you have no intention of harming this innocent man and his younger brother, thinking thereby to enjoy unchallenged kingship."

So Bharad·vaja spoke, and with tears in his eyes Bhárata replied to him in a voice breaking with sorrow: “I am lost 84.15 if even the holy one thinks such a thing of me! Oh, do not suspect evil of me, do not rebuke me so. I never wanted what my mother demanded on my behalf; it gives me no satisfaction, and I will not accede to her demand. On the contrary, I am on my way to beg forgiveness of the tiger among men, to do obeisance at his feet and to bring him back to Ayódhya. That is the reason I have come—believe me, holy one. Please show me your grace and tell me the present whereabouts of Rama, the lord of earth.”

Graciously Bharad·vaja replied to Bhárata, “Such behavior toward your guru, such restraint and adherence to the ways of the good, become you, tiger among men, as a son of the Rághava dynasty. I knew what was in your heart and 84.20 only questioned you to hear it openly confirmed and to see your fame magnified to the highest degree. Your brother is living on the great mountain Chitra·kuta. Tomorrow you shall go to that place, but stay here tonight with your counsellors. Grant me this desire, wise prince. You are mindful of the desires and needs of others.” Prince Bhárata, a man of noble vision, was overjoyed and replied with a word of assent, for he had decided that he would indeed spend the night in the great ashram.

ONCE BHÁRATA, SON of Kaikéyi, had decided to spend 85.1 the night there, the sage offered hospitality to him. Bhárata replied, “But surely you have already done as much. The water for our feet and the welcome offering are the why in fact did you station the army so far away before coming here? Why did you not approach with your army, bull among men?”

Bhárata cupped his hands in reverence as he replied to the ascetic, “I did not approach with my army, holy one, for fear of the holy one. Spirited horses, men and huge rutting elephants follow in my train, holy one, covering the wide earth. I was afraid they would ruin the land and water, the trees and leaf huts of the ashram, so I came alone.” “Bring the army here,” the great seer commanded him, and Bhárata accordingly had the army advance.

Bharad-vaja entered the fire-sanctuary, sipped water and 85.10 wiped his mouth. He then invoked Vishva-karman in order to provide the hospitality. “I invoke Vishva-karman and Tvashtri, too. It is my intention to provide hospitality, and to this end let all these arrangements be made for me: Let the rivers flowing eastward and flowing westward, on earth and in the sky, now come together from wherever they may be. Let some of them flow with date-palm liquor, and some with long-aged wine, others with cool water tasting like the juice of sugarcane. women who wait on Shakra and those who wait on Brahma—all these do I invoke to come with Tumburu and with all their trappings. Let Kubéra's heavenly forest come from the land of the Kurus, the forest whose foliage is raiment and jewelry, and which constantly bears fruit in the form of heavenly women. Let the blessed moon come and provide me with the most exquisite food, solid and soft, and things to suck and lick, in great variety and quantity; many-colored garlands, too, dropping from the trees, wine and every other type of drink and meats of different sorts."

So the sage spoke in his deep concentration, incomparable power and ascetic energy, his words accented in full accord with the rules of pronunciation. As he continued 85.20 rapt in meditation, facing east, hands cupped in reverence, one by one all those heavenly things began to appear. A soft breeze began to blow, with a faint touch of the spice hills of Málaya and Dárdura, a most pleasant, comforting and gracious breeze that cooled one's sweat. Heavenly clouds rolled in, showering blossoms, and in every direction could be heard the sounds of the bass drums of the gods. Gentle winds began to blow, troupes of ápsarases danced, the gandhárvas of the gods sang and their lutes gave forth notes. The sound they sent up carried to heaven and over the earth to the ears of the people, a smooth and even sound with graceful rhythm.

The heavenly sound charmed the ears of the men, and 85.25
when it faded, Bhárata's army beheld the creations of Vishva-karman. The ground had been levelled out all around to a distance of five leagues, and luxuriant lawns carpeted it, glistening like sapphire or cat's-eye beryl. Bilva trees sprang

From the land of the northern Kurus came the forest with its heavenly delights, and the heavenly river with trees densely covering its banks. Splendid four-room houses suddenly appeared, stables for the horses and elephants, clusters of castles and mansions, and lovely archways. And there was a royal palace that looked like a silvery cloud. It had a grand archway and was beautified with white garlands and perfumed with heavenly fragrances. It was four-cornered and spacious, complete with couches, chairs and carriages, provisioned with heavenly delights to suit every taste, with heavenly delicacies and garments. It was stocked with all manner of food, with utensils polished spotlessly, seats properly arranged for everyone, and a magnificent couch with a sumptuous spread. It was a majestic residence filled with treasures, and with the permission of the great seer, great-armed Bhárata, son of Kaikéyi, entered it. 85.30

Behind him followed all the counsellors and the family priest, and they rejoiced to see the arrangements provided in the residence. There was a heavenly throne in it, a fan and a parasol, and with his ministers Bhárata approached as if the king were there. He paid homage to the throne, prostrating himself before Rama, and taking up the yak-tail fan he sat down upon a minister's seat. Then all the others sat down in due order, the counsellors and the family priest, next the chief of the army, and finally the palace supervisor. At Bharad-vaja's command, rivers running with rice pudding instantly sprang up before Bhárata. Along either bank of the 85.35

And at the very same instant there came twenty thousand 85.40 women sent by Brahma, decked out with heavenly jewelry. Twenty thousand more women came, sent by Kubéra, all adorned with coral, gold, gems and pearls. A troupe of twenty thousand ápsarases came from Nándana, who could madden with passion any man they took in their arms. The kings of the gandhárvas—Nárada, Tumburu, Gopa, Párvata, Surya-várchasa—began to sing in the presence of Bhárata. And before him danced Alámbusha, Mishra-keshi, Pundaríka and Vámana, at Bharad-vaja's command.

All the garlands to be found among the gods and in 85.45 the Chitra-ratha forest appeared there at Prayága at Bharad-vaja's command. Bilva trees became drummers and fig trees dancers, with bedda-nut trees beating the time, by the ascetic power of Bharad-vaja. Pines and palmyra trees, evergreens and beeches massed together in delight, becoming hunchbacks or dwarfs. Shínshapa and myrobalan trees, rose-apples and all the vines of the woodlands assumed the form of women and took up their dwelling in Bharad-vaja's ashram. "There is wine to drink for all who wish to drink," they cried. "There is rice pudding for those who are hungry and succulent meat to eat, as much as you desire!" The 85.50 women then rubbed the men with oil and bathed them at the murmuring riverbanks, fifteen women for every single man. The eyes of the lovely ladies sparkled bright as they approached and massaged the men, and after drying them off they gave each other things to drink.

The draft animals of the great Ikshváku soldiers—the horses, elephants, asses, camels and oxen, the sons of Súrabhi—were fed with sugarcane and sweet barley by strong men who bade them eat. For the horse trainers ignored their horses and the elephant handlers their elephants; the whole army was delirious with drink and pleasure. Their every desire gratified, anointed with red sandalwood cream, the soldiers shouted out from where they lay with the troupes of āpsarases:

“We will never go back to Ayódhya, nor on to Dándaka! May Bhárata fare well, and good luck to Rama too!” 85.55
So the foot soldiers shouted, and the riders and trainers of the elephants and horses, for after such a reception they recognized no master. By the thousand the men of Bhárata’s retinue roared in delight and cried out, “This is heaven!” And no sooner would they finish some ambrosial treat than they would glance at the other heavenly foods and turn their thoughts once more to eating.

The female servants and slave girls, the wives and women accompanying the army all found themselves dressed in fresh garments and they too wanted for nothing. The elephants, asses and camels, the cows and horses, and even the wild birds and beasts were well provisioned, and no one had to provide for any of them. There was not a man to be seen whose garments were not sparkling white, not one who was hungry or dirty or whose hair was begrimed with dust. To their amazement the men beheld thousands of metal pots crowned with flowers and banners, filled to the brim with white rice, goat meat and boar meat, with mounds of choice condiments and fragrant, flavorful soups 85.60 prepared from fruit stock. Along the edges of the forest were wells thick with rice pudding; there were wishing-cows, too, and trees dripping with honey. There were pools filled with date-palm wine and ringed about with mounds of savory meats prepared in steaming cauldrons—venison, peacock and chicken. There were thousands of platters made of gold, and well-fired trays and jars and jugs filled with curds. There were ponds filled with buttermilk scented with fresh yellow woodapple, filled with white curds or rice pudding, and there were mounds of sugar. 85.65

At the landing places on the river the men beheld ointments and fragrant powders and bathing requisites, all stored in containers. There were stacks of toothbrushes, white and bristled, white sandalwood ointment packed in vials, and sparkling clean mirrors. There were piles of clothing and pairs of shoes and sandals by the thousand. There were collyrium boxes, combs and brushes; parasols, bows and shining armor; couches and chairs. There were full streams for watering the asses, camels, elephants and horses, and streams just right for bathing, with lovely landings, lotuses and water lilies. All about they saw mounds of soft barley-grass the color of sapphire or cat's-eye beryl for strewing before the animals. The men were lost in wonder at the sight of the marvelous hospitality—like something in a dream—that the great seer provided for Bhárata. 85.70

And while they were enjoying themselves like this in Bharad-vaja's lovely ashram, just like the gods in Nándana, the night slipped away. Then the rivers, the gandhárvas and all the lovely women took leave of Bharad-vaja and returned just as they had come. But the men were still drunk and 85.75 him, Bhárata went with his escort and of his own accord approached Bharad·vaja. Bharad·vaja had completed his fire offerings when he observed that Bhárata, tiger among men, had come with hands cupped in reverence. The seer addressed him: "I trust you spent a pleasant night here in our domain. Were your people content with the hospitality? Tell me, blameless prince." The supremely powerful seer strode from his ashram, and Bhárata, hands cupped in reverence, prostrated himself and replied: "I, my ministers and all my 86.5 army, and even the draft animals, have passed the night quite pleasantly, holy one. You have gratified most amply our every desire. We have been well fed and well housed, and our fatigue and pain have been allayed. Yes, all of us, the servants included, have passed the night most pleasantly. And though I must now bid you farewell, holy one, foremost of seers, please turn a friendly eye upon me as I set out to find my brother. Direct me to the ashram of my great and righteous brother. Tell me which road to take, righteous seer, and how far I must go."

Questioned in this fashion, Bharad·vaja, the great and mighty ascetic, answered Bhárata, who was yearning for the sight of his brother. "Bhárata, at a distance of two and a 86.10 a place of lovely caverns and woodlands. Along its northern flank runs the Mandákini River, thickly bordered with flowering trees and lovely flowering woodlands. Between the stream and Mount Chitra-kuta their leaf-hut will be standing, my son. I am certain the two of them are living there. Illustrious lord of the army, if you lead your army of elephants, horses and chariots by way of the southern road, keeping toward the southwest, you will soon see Rághava.”

When the wives of the king of kings heard they were about to depart, they left their fine carriages—and fine carriages they always deserved—and crowded around the brahman Bharad-vaja. Trembling, haggard and desolate, Kausál-ya along with Queen Sumíttra grasped the sage's feet with her hands. Kaikéyi, her every desire thwarted, an object of contempt to all the world, was overcome with shame as she, too, grasped his feet. Reverently she circled the great and holy sage and with a desolate heart stood apart, not far from Bhárata. Then Bharad-vaja, a sage strict in his vows, made a request of Bhárata: “I should like to make the acquaintance of your mothers individually, Rághava.” 86.15

So Bharad-vaja spoke, and the righteous and eloquent Bhárata cupped his hands in reverence and spoke these words: “This woman whom you see, holy one, who is like a goddess though desolate now and haggard with grief and fasting, is Kausál-ya, my father's chief queen. It is she who bore Rama, the tiger among men who moves with the gait of a lion, as Áditi bore Dhatri. The woman holding her by the left arm, with as wretched a look as a karni-kara branch stripped of its blossoms in the heart of the forest, is the 86.20 queen whose sons are the godlike Lákshmana and Shatrúghna, mighty and valorous princes. She on whose account the two tigers among men went away dead in life, on whose account King Dasha-ratha was bereft of his sons and so went to heaven—behold her, the power-hungry Kaikéyi, 86.25 an ignoble woman in a noblewoman's guise, a vicious and malevolent person—my mother, and the one in whom I see this great calamity of mine to have its source.” The tiger among men stopped, his voice choked with sobs, his eyes bloodshot, fitfully heaving sighs like an angry snake.

When Bhárata had finished speaking, the great and wise seer Bharad-vaja replied with words of great import: “Bhárata, you must not impute any fault to Kaikéyi. The banishment of Rama will turn out to be a great blessing.”

Bhárata did obeisance and received his benediction, and after reverently circling and taking leave of him, he commanded the army, “Harness up!” The different groups of 86.30 people then harnessed the many heavenly horse-chariots with fittings of gold, and they boarded, eager to be off. The elephants, both bulls and cows, girt with gold, their pennants flying, set forth with a rumble, like clouds at the end of summer. The different kinds of vehicles set forth, large ones and small ones and some of great value, while the foot soldiers set out on foot. Eager to see Rama, the women, with Kausálya at their head, set forth cheerfully in their distinguished vehicles. A handsome palanquin was standing ready, resplendent as the morning sun, and majestic Bhárata got in and set forth with his escort. Teeming 86.35 with elephants, horses and chariots, the great army, like a massive lofty cloud, set forth turning southward, traversing

wild bull elephants that lived in the forest were thrown into confusion and ran off with their herds. So, too, were the monkeys and droves of dappled gazelle and black antelope that were everywhere to be seen in the stretches of the forest, on the mountains, and at the riverbanks. The righteous son of Dasha-ratha happily proceeded in the company of his great and clamorous army of four divisions. Great Bhá-rata's army was like the ocean's flood, or the clouds that blanket heaven in the rains, the way it blanketed the earth. For the earth was inundated with a flood of swift horses 87.5 and elephants, and for a long time it disappeared altogether from sight.

Majestic Bhárata had covered a great distance, and his mounts had grown weary when he addressed Vasíshta, the best of counsellors: "We have clearly come to the region Bharad-vaja spoke of: the scene that appears before us is just as I heard it described. Here are Mount Chitra-kuta and the Mandákini River, and there, at a distance, the forest can be seen, blue-black as a storm cloud. Even now my elephants, mountain-like themselves, are trampling the lovely slopes of Mount Chitra-kuta. The trees upon the 87.10

where kínnaras roam, and now the horses are swarming over it like dolphins through the ocean. Startled herds of deer are darting off—they look like banks of clouds in the sky shredded by the autumn wind. The trees, with their cloud-dark branches and the fragrant flower-chaplets they wear upon their crowns, look like men of the south.

The forest had been still and dreadful in appearance, but now, with all these throngs of people, it seems like Ayódhya to me. The dust kicked up by hoofs hung obscuring the sky, 87.15 but a breeze has come and quickly dispelled it, as if to do me a kindness. Look, Shatrúghna, how the master charioteers drive the horse-drawn carriages and how they fly along so swiftly through the woodlands. And now those lovely peacocks—look, they are frightened and scurrying off to the mountain, the dwelling place of birds. I find this a perfectly charming spot, clearly a place where ascetics would live—it is like the very pathway to heaven. The many charming dappled deer with their mates in the forest appear as if it were the blossoms that lent them their brilliant coloring. Come, 87.20 let soldiers set out and search the woodland, to see if those tigers among men, Rama and Lákshmana, are anywhere to be found.”

Receiving Bhárata's order, warriors with weapons in hand entered the forest and soon caught sight of smoke. On observing the column of smoke, they returned and reported it to Bhárata. “Where there is fire there must be men,” they said. “Clearly the two Rághavas are somewhere nearby. Then again, those tigers among men, the two enemy-slaying princes, may not be here, but others clearly are, ascetics like Rama.” Hearing these just and reasonable words, Bhárata,

had been living on the mountain, he had grown to love the mountains and the forest. Once, eager to please Vaidéhi and beguile his own mind, he showed his wife around wonderful Chitra-kuta, as Indra, breaker of fortresses, might show Shachi.

“Neither my expulsion from the kingdom, my dear, nor being apart from my loved ones pains my heart when I am viewing this lovely mountain. Look at the mountain, my dear, home to flocks of many different birds, how its peaks almost scrape the sky and veins of minerals adorn it. What a brilliant sight the lordly mountain is with its 88.5
different regions adorned with minerals. Some sparkle silvery; some look blood-red or are tinted yellow or madder-crimson; some gleam like the rarest gems; some shine like topaz or crystal or the pale white screw-pine flower, or gleam like stars or quicksilver. What a sight the mountain makes, swarming with birds and teeming with herds of beasts, panthers, hyenas and monkeys, all of them tame.

boo, white Kashmiri teaks, soapnut trees, quince and butter trees, evergreens, jujubes and myrobalan trees, nipas, cane, dhánvans and pomegranates.

Look, my dear, there on the lovely hillsides are some spirited kinnaras, impassioned with desire and pairing off to make love. And look there, where those swords and delicate garments are hanging from the branches: those are the enchanting pleasure bowers of the vidya-dhara women. What a sight the mountain makes with its waterfalls, one here, one there, and with its springs and running streams—it is like an elephant running with ichor. The breeze out of the grottoes bears the fragrance of different flowers and approaches with such pleasing redolence—what man would it not gladden? If I might live here all the years to come 88.15 with you, my flawless wife, and with Lákshmana, I would never feel the searing pain of grief. For I delight in this lovely mountain, my beautiful wife, with its magnificent peaks where fruit and flowers are so abundant and many different birds come flocking. And my living in the forest has brought me a twofold reward; my father has discharged his debt to righteousness, and Bhárata has been pleased as well.

Vaidéhi, you take delight, don't you, in being with me on Chitra-kuta, with so many different marvels before your eyes to experience, to contemplate and talk about? Living in the forest—as the royal seers of old, my ancestors, used to say—is the real drink of immortality for kings, and leads to well-being after death.

How beautiful the rocks of the mountain are, massive 88.20 rocks, hundreds of them all around, so many and so colorful—blue-black, yellow, white and pink. At night the plants growing on the lordly mountain seem like tongues of fire, blazing by the thousand in the beauty of their own luster.

Some parts of the mountain, my lovely, look like dwelling places or gardens, while others are sheer rock. It is as if Chitra-kuta had arisen, splitting open the earth, but over there its peak seems gracious in every way. There you can see the sumptuous beds of lovers, spread with leaves of the wild ginger tree, the laurel, waxflower and birch, and interspersed with lotus petals. Their lotus garlands can be seen, too, cast aside now by the lovers and crushed. And there, my beloved, look at all those different fruits. So rich in fruit and roots and water is Mount Chitra-kuta that it almost surpasses Vasv-aukasára, Nálini or the land of the northern Kurus. 88.25

Passing this time with you, my beloved Sita, and with Lákshmana, will be a pleasure to me, and one that fosters the righteousness of my House, for I shall be keeping to the path of the good with the utmost self-restraint.”

THEN THE LORD OF Kósala, making his way down the mountain, showed Máithili where the clear waters of the lovely Mandákiní River ran. Lotus-eyed Rama spoke to the daughter of the king of Vidéha, his broad-hipped wife with a face as fair as the moon. “Just look at the lovely Mandákiní River with its sparkling sandbanks, the geese and cranes that make their home there, the flowers embellishing it, the fruiting and blossoming trees of every sort that grow thick upon its banks. Wherever one looks it shimmers like Nálini, the lake of Kubéra, king of kings. Herds of animals have drunk here, and though the landing places are turbid now, they are lovely still and give me much pleasure. Over there seers wearing hides, matted hair and upper garments of bark cloth are immersing themselves in the Mandákiní River, my 89.1 89.5

beloved, for it is the appointed hour. Those others are sages who take rigorous vows and worship the sun, my large-eyed wife, with their arms held high in self-mortification. As the wind buffets the treetops, and they strew their leaves and flowers all about the river, the mountain seems almost ready to dance.

Look at the Mandákini River there, where its water flows crystal-clear, and there, where its sandy beaches stretch out, and over there, where perfected beings crowd about it. Look at the flowers the wind has shaken off and massed into drifts, or those others bobbing in the middle of the water. Those sweet-voiced birds are sheldrakes, my precious, the ones alighting on the drifts of flowers and uttering their pleasant cries. To set one's eyes on Chitra-kuta and the Mandákini, my lovely, is far better than living in the town—in your eyes, too, I think. 89.10

Come plunge with me into the river. Its waters, as always, are agitated only by perfected beings, men cleansed of all impurities and endowed with ascetic power, self-restraint and tranquility. Plunge into the Mandákini, my lovely Sita, as if it were an old friend of yours, submerging the lotuses and water lilies. Just think of the wild animals as the townsmen all the while, my beloved, of the mountain as Ayódhya, and this river as the Sárayu. You both bring me such joy, both righteous Lákshmana, who attends to my orders, and you, Vaidéhi, who are so agreeable. Being here with you, bathing at the time of the three oblations, and eating sweet fruit and roots, I no longer yearn either for Ayódhya or the kingship. The man does not exist who would not find repose and happiness beholding this river, the herds of elephants that 89.15

So Rama, heir of the Raghu dynasty, spoke with his beloved about the river, fondly and at length, as he went strolling over lovely Chitra-kuta, a very balm to the eye.

NOW, AS RAMA was sitting there, he perceived the noise 90.1 and the dust—they reached to heaven—of Bhárata’s approaching army. The wild bull elephants, meanwhile, were frightened by the deafening noise, and in panic they and their herds ran scattering in every direction. Rághava heard the noise made by the army and noticed all the elephants running away. And watching them run off, and listening to the din, Rama addressed Lákshmana Saumítri, a man of blazing power: “Ho there, Lákshmana, worthy son of Su- 90.5
mítra, go and take a look. A tumultuous clamor has broken out, awesome and deep as thunder. Perhaps a king or royal officer is out hunting in the forest, or it could be something else, an animal maybe. Please find out, Saumítri, find out as quickly as you can exactly what this all might be.”

Lákshmana hurriedly climbed a flowering sala tree, and, peering about in every direction, he turned to the east. Craning his neck and peering out, he saw a vast army, a mass of chariots, horses and elephants, and foot soldiers among them on the alert. He informed Rama of the army teeming with horses and elephants, decked out with chariot-standards, and then added: “Put out the fire, brother, and let 90.10 and armor!" Rama, tiger among men, replied to Lákshmana, "Very well, but consider first, Saumítri: to whom do you think this army might belong?"

Like a raging fire ready to burn the army to ashes, Lákshmana replied to Rama: "Clearly now that he has got the consecration he wants to have the kingship wholly in his power and is coming to kill the two of us—who else but Bhárata, the son of Kaikéyi! There, in fact, the lofty majestic tree is coming into view: the standard of the spreading kovidára shining brilliantly atop his chariot. There are men mounted on speeding horses drawing close at will, and how excited those riders appear mounted on the elephants. Let us take our bows and fall back to the mountain, my mighty brother, or make our stand right here, armed for battle with our weapons at the ready. If only the kovidára standard would come within our range in battle! If only I could catch sight of Bhárata, the cause of the great calamity that has befallen you, Rághava, Sita and me. Your enemy has arrived, mighty Rághava, he who brought about your expulsion from the ancient kingship. It is Bhárata, and I will kill him. 90.15

I see no wrong, Rághava, in slaying Bhárata. No unrighteousness comes from ridding oneself of a man who was first to give offense. When he has been struck down you shall rule the whole treasure-laden earth. If only that power-hungry woman Kaikéyi could see her son killed by me today in combat—like a tree felled by an elephant—and feel the anguish of bitter sorrow. But no, I will slay Kaikéyi, too, and her supporters and kinsmen. Let the earth be cleansed today of this foul scum! our dishonor, like fire upon dry grass. Today I will rend the enemies' bodies with my sharp arrows, and spatter the woodlands of Chitra-kuta with their blood. And when my arrows have rent the hearts of their elephants and horses, let wild beasts drag them off, and the men, too, when I have cut them down. I have always discharged my debt to my 90.25 bow and arrows in great battles, and I have no doubt I shall again in destroying Bhárata and all his army."

IN AN EFFORT to calm Lákshmana Saumítri, who was 91.1 so violently agitated and almost beside himself with rage, Rama spoke these words: "What need is there of a bow or sword and shield when it is the great archer, wise Bhárata himself, who is coming? It is only to be expected that Bhárata should wish to see us. He would not do us any harm, nor even contemplate it. When has Bhárata ever opposed you, or made you any such threat that you should now have these suspicions of him? You must not speak disparagingly 91.5 or abusively of Bhárata. It is I who would be abused were any abuse directed against him. How, after all, could a son kill his father, whatever the extremity, or a brother his brother, Saumítri, his very own breath of life? If it is for the sake of the kingship that you are saying these things, I shall tell Bhárata when I see him, 'Hand over the kingship to him.' For were I plainly to tell him, Lákshmana, 'Offer him the kingship,' Bhárata's only response would be, 'Of course.'"

So spoke his righteous brother, whose welfare was his one concern, and Lákshmana seemed almost to shrink into himself for shame. Rághava noticed Lákshmana's chagrin and once again addressed him: "I think the great-armed prince has come here only to visit us. Or perhaps he wants to take Vaidéhi home. He may have had second thoughts about her staying in the forest, a woman used to every comfort. There you can see the team of splendid horses, my mighty brother, those thoroughbred, magnificent swift horses, in speed like the rushing wind. And there is Shatruñjaya, our wise father's aged and massive elephant, lumbering at the head of the army."

Climbing down from the top of the sala tree, Lákshmana, champion in battle, came and stood at Rama's side, hands cupped in reverence. On orders from Bhárata that there be no disturbance, the army had pitched camp all around the mountain. For a league and a half along the slope of the mountain the Ikshváku army encamped with its throngs of elephants, horses and chariots. The army made a brilliant sight when Bhárata had marshalled it there on Chitra-kuta the day he came, shedding his pride and honoring the claims of righteousness, to conciliate the delight of the Raghus with all the diplomacy at his command.

AFTER ENCAMPING THE army, lordly Bhárata, the best of men who walk the earth, set out walking to find Kákútstha, who was a guru to him. As soon as the army was duly encamped as he had instructed, Bhárata addressed his brother Shatrúghna:

“Dear brother, you must at once explore the whole extent of the forest, with troops of our men and these hunters to accompany you. I shall find no peace until I see Rama, powerful Lákshmana and illustrious Vaidéhi. I shall find no peace until I see the lovely moonlike face of my brother and his lotus-petal eyes. I shall find no peace until I bow my head to my brother’s feet, which bear all the signs of sovereignty. I shall find no peace until he assumes, as he deserves, his position in the kingship of our fathers and forefathers, with the consecration water moist upon his head. Illustrious Vaidéhi, the daughter of Jánaka, has fulfilled herself by following her husband, master of the ocean-girdled earth. How fortunate is Chitra-kuta, that mountain equal to Himálaya, king of mountains, where Rama is living like Kubéra in Nándana. This trackless forest, the haunt of wild beasts, has fulfilled itself as well, to have become the dwelling place of Rama, the best of all who bear arms.”

With this, mighty Bhárata, bull among men, set out on foot into the great forest. The eloquent prince made his way through the thickets growing on the mountain slopes, their treetops all in bloom. Upon reaching the flowering sala tree atop Mount Chitra-kuta, he spied the towering banner of the fire burning in Rama’s ashram. Majestic Bhárata and his kinsmen rejoiced to see it, knowing that Rama must be there; the prince felt as if at last he had made the farther shore of an ocean. Perceiving upon Mount Chitra-kuta Rama’s ashram and the holy men there, great Bhárata hurried off with Guha after again encamping the army.

NOW, ONCE THE army was encamped, Bhárata set out 93.1
 impatient to see his brother, showing the way for Shatrú-ghna. He had instructed the seer Vasíshttha to bring his mothers directly, while he himself hurried on ahead, out of deep love for his guru. Sumántra likewise followed close behind Shatrúghna, for he was no less ardent than Bhára-ta to see Rama again. Majestic Bhárata advanced and soon could see his brother's leaf-hut and thatched cottage situated within an ascetic's retreat. In front of the lodge Bhárata saw 93.5 the logs that had been cut and the flowers that had been gathered. And in the forest he saw the dry dung of buffalo and other animals collected in great mounds for use against the cold.

As brilliant, great-armed Bhárata proceeded he excitedly spoke to Shatrúghna and the ministers all around him: "I think we must have reached the spot Bharad-vaja spoke of; the Mandákini River cannot be far from here, I think.
 This must be the trail, for above strips of bark have been fastened. Lákshmana must have marked it for travelling at night. And that one must only be a path beaten on the 93.10 mountain slope by the large-tusked elephants charging and trumpeting at one another. There you can see the thick smoke from black-trailed fire; it is customary for ascetics to maintain a fire continuously in the forest. It is here I shall have the delight of seeing my noble brother Rághava, who is living like a great seer to do his guru honor."

Bhárata Rághava continued on and soon reached the place where Chitra-kuta abuts the Mandákini. He addressed the people with him:

“The tiger among men must sit on the ground and practice the ‘heroic’ posture in yoga—the lord of all people in this unpeopled place. A curse on me that I was born and that I live! Because of me a calamity has befallen brilliant 93.15
Rághava, the master of the world. He has had to renounce all pleasures and make his dwelling in the forest. And the world condemns me for this. But now I will go and beg their forgiveness; I will throw myself down again and again at the feet of Rama and Sita.”

As the son of Dasha-ratha was lamenting in this fashion, he saw a large, enchanting and holy leaf-hut in the forest, densely thatched with sala tree, palmyra and ashva-karna leaves. It was a spacious hut with soft kusha grass spread about, like an altar at a sacred rite. Bows adorned it, gleaming like rainbows, heavy, sturdy and backed with gold, of a sort that could rout any foe. Arrows flashing like sunbeams 93.20 adorned it, too, like the serpents adorning Bhógavati, awesome arrows packed in quivers, with heads blazing. A pair of swords in golden scabbards shed a luster over the hut, and two shields lent their adornment, brilliantly embossed with gold. Brilliant forearm-guards and finger-guards studded with gold were hanging there, too. It was a place as impregnable to enemy hordes as a lion’s cave to deer. Bhá-rata saw a holy altar there in Rama’s residence, broad and sloping to the northeast, with a blazing fire upon it. Glancing about, Bhá-rata suddenly saw his guru Rama seated in the thatched cottage, wearing a crown of matted hair.

He saw Rama seated there, dressed in a black antelope hide and bark-cloth garment. He was the image of fire in every respect, with the shoulders of a lion, great arms and lotus-petal eyes—the righteous master of all the ocean-girdled earth. He looked like the eternal Brahma as he sat together with Sita and Lákshmana upon the floor strewn with darbha grass. When majestic Bhárata saw him, both sorrow and confusion overwhelmed him at once, and righteous Bhárata, the son of Kaikéyi, went running to him. The mere sight of Rama anguished him, and he broke out in sob-choked lamentation. He could hardly endure it, and yet he steadied himself to speak: 93.25

“The man to whom his subjects in the assembly should rightly be paying homage, here he sits, my elder brother, receiving the homage of beasts of the wild. The man who in the past was accustomed to clothes worth many thousands, here he is, the great man, wearing deerskins in the performance of righteousness. How can Rághava bear this burden of matted hair, when he used to wear many-colored flowers of every variety? The man who should rightly be gaining abundant merit through sacrifices performed according to precept now seeks it by mortifying his body. It had always been precious sandalwood cream that coated my noble brother’s limbs. How is it possible they are now coated with dirt? It is my fault this misery has befallen Rama, who had known nothing but happiness. A curse on my life, vile creature that I am, an object of scorn to all the world!” So Bhárata lamented in desolation and, his lotus face breaking out in sweat, he reached in vain for Rama’s feet and collapsed in tears. 93.30 93.35

Consumed with sorrow, the powerful prince Bhárata exclaimed in desolation, “My brother,” but could say nothing further. He glanced at glorious Rama, and through a sob-choked throat he cried out only “My brother!,” unable to utter anything more. Shatrúghna was weeping, too, as he prostrated himself at Rama’s feet. And as Rama embraced the two of them, he shed tears as well. The two princes then met with Sumántra and Guha there in the wilderness—it was as if the day-bringing sun and the night-bringing moon were to meet with the planets Shukra and Brihas·pati in the sky. The inhabitants of the forest watched as the princes, men like bull elephants, were reunited there in the great wilderness, and they lost all delight as well, and every one of them burst into tears. 93.40

 “What has become of your father, dear brother, that you have come to the wilderness? While he yet lives you should not be going off to the forest. It is a long time, indeed, since I have seen Bhárata, who has come from so far into this wilderness. Why have you come to the forest, dear brother, looking so somber? King Dasha·ratha is in good health, I trust, still true to his given word, still performing royal consecrations and horse-sacrifices, and deciding points of law. I trust proper homage is still being shown the wise and brilliant brahman, dear brother, the preceptor of the Ikshvákus, who is constant in righteousness. honor your family priest, I trust, a highborn man, learned and disciplined, who gives instruction ungrudgingly.

I hope you have appointed a man to tend your sacred fires who is sagacious and upright and knows the ritual precepts. I trust he always informs you in a timely fashion both before and after the oblations have been offered. I trust you continue to hold the preceptor Sudhanván in esteem, dear brother. He is expert in the most formidable arrows and missiles, and a master of the science of statecraft. You have made brave men your counsellors, I trust, dear brother, men you look upon as your very self—men who are learned, self-controlled and highborn, and able to read a man's thoughts in his face. Counsel is the basis of a king's success, Rághava—when it is well kept by counsellors and ministers skilled in the science. You are not ruled by sleep, I trust, but are always awake early, while spending the late-night hours reflecting on what makes for prudent statecraft. I trust you take counsel neither all by yourself nor with a multitude. And, once determined, your counsel does not, I hope, fly about the kingdom. 94.10

I hope that the enterprises you decide on involve little expense and bring great profit, and that you undertake them quickly, without procrastinating. I trust kings learn of your every venture only when fully accomplished, or nearly so, and not beforehand. Your counsels, dear brother, or your ministers', even when not betrayed, cannot be discovered, I hope, through reasoning or supposition. You prefer, I trust, a single wise man to a thousand fools. At times of political crisis a wise man can confer great benefits. A king may turn to thousands of fools, to tens of thousands, but they will not 94.15 render him the least assistance. Yet even a single minister who is clever, brave, capable and knowledgeable can secure great royal fortune for a king or his officer.

I trust you have appointed servants to the tasks appropriate to them, the foremost servants to the most important tasks, the middling to the middling ones and the lowly to the low. I trust you appoint your principal ministers to the principal tasks, men who hold hereditary positions, who are honest and have passed the test of loyalty. People have no reason to despise you, I hope, as sacrificial priests despise an outcaste, or women a lover who takes them brutally. Remember, too, that a shrewd man with cunning schemes, a servant prone to corruption, or a man who is bold and hungry for power will slay you if you do not strike first. 94.20

I trust you have appointed as your general a bold and brave man, one who is steady, sagacious, honest, highborn, loyal and capable. You show honor and esteem to your foremost soldiers, I trust, the courageous, powerful men who are skilled in battle and have already evinced their heroism. I trust you pay, when payment is due, the appropriate wages and rations to your army, and do not defer them. If the time for their wages and rations is missed, servants grow angry with their masters and are easily corrupted—and this, as it is set down in the texts, can lead to very great misfortune. 94.25

I hope everyone has remained loyal to you, especially the men of good family, and would willingly give up his life in your cause. I trust you always choose a man of the provinces as your envoy, Bhárata, a wise, diplomatic, perceptive and discerning man, who repeats exactly what he is told. I hope, crusher of your foes, you do not wrongly view as harmless any hostile men who, once deported, have made their way back. You do not, I hope, associate with brahmans who are materialists, dear brother. Their only skill is in bringing misfortune; they are fools who think themselves wise. Although preeminent texts on righteous conduct are ready to hand, those ignorant fellows derive their ideas from logic alone and so propound utter nonsense.

I trust you are keeping Ayódhya content and prosperous, dear brother, the city where from ancient times our heroic ancestors have lived. I trust the city with its sturdy gates is still true to its name, 'The Impregnable,' still thronging with elephants, horses and chariots, still crowded with nobles by the thousand—brahmans, kshátriya and vaishyas—every 94.35 one of them remaining, as always, prompt in his own tasks, self-controlled and energetic. I trust the city is still crowded with mansions of various construction and thronged with learned people.

I trust that the countryside is still prospering, Rághava, and that life there continues comfortable, with shrines abounding by the hundred, with sanctuaries, wells and pools lending their adornment. I trust that the people are well settled, and the men and women happy; that fairs and festivals lend their adornment, and that the boundary lines are well spaced. The land is still rich in cattle and free from disasters, I trust, still nourished beyond the whim of the rain god, still lovely and safe from wild beasts. I hope you 94.40

Foremost of champions, I trust you make due allocation of tone—and you are aware of the proper time for each, Bhárata—and attend to all three, to matters of righteousness, of the state, and of personal desire.

I trust you avoid the fourteen errors of kings: atheism; falsehood; irascibility; inattention; procrastination; shunning the wise; indolence; sensual indulgence; solitary determination of political affairs; taking counsel with those ignorant of such affairs; failure to execute your decisions, to keep your counsel secret, or to employ auspicious rites; and indiscriminate courtesy. I trust you never eat savory foods all by yourself, Rághava, and that you give aid to allies when they request it.”

AFTER LISTENING TO RAMA’S WORDS, Bhárata replied, 95.1
“What good is it for me to know the right conduct of kings, when I am wholly lost to righteousness? There is an ancient practice of righteousness, bull among men, one established among us for all time. It is this: with the eldest brother living, your majesty, a younger may not become king. So come back with me, Rághava, to the prosperous city of Ayódhya, and have yourself consecrated for the good of our House. Some say a king is but a mortal; I esteem him a god. His conduct in matters of righteousness and statecraft, it is rightly said, is beyond that of mere mortals. While I was 95.5 still in the land of the Kékayas, my brother, and you had withdrawn to the wilderness, the king, a man esteemed by the good, a performer of sacrifices, went to heaven. Arise, tiger among men, make the funeral libation to Father. Shatrúghna here and I have already done so. It is said, Rághava, that what a well-loved person gives to those in the world of the ancestors abides forever—and Father loved you well.”

When he heard Bhárata's piteous words that told him of his father's death—the dreadful words Bhárata spoke, which struck him like a bolt of lightning—Rama Rághava, slayer of enemies, lost consciousness. Throwing out his arms he fell to the ground like a flowering tree in the forest cut down by an axe. Fallen upon the earth, Rama, the lord 95.10 of earth, resembled a bull elephant asleep, grown weary from striking a riverbank. His three brothers and Vaidéhi wept as they sprinkled water upon him, the great bowman, utterly broken by grief. Soon Kakútstha revived, and with tears trickling from his eyes he began a long and sorrowful lament:

“What good was I, a wretched son, to my great father? He died of grief for me, and I could not even perform the final rites for him. Oh Bhárata, my blameless brother, you have achieved your greatest goal, you and Shatrúghna, since you could honor the king with all the rites for the dead. Ayódhya 95.15 is bereft of the lord of men; it no longer has its chief, no longer has direction. Even were my stay in the forest over, I could not bear to go back. When my stay in the forest is at an end, slayer of enemies, who will there be in Ayódhya ever again to give me guidance, now that father has gone to the other world? In the past when Father noticed good conduct on my part, he would say such gratifying things to me, so pleasant to hear. From whom am I to hear them now?" When he finished speaking to Bhárata, Rághava approached his wife, her face like the full moon, and consumed with grief he said to her:

"Sita, your father-in-law is dead, and you, Lákshmana, have lost your father. Bhárata has brought the sorrowful news that the lord of earth has gone to heaven."

As Kakútstha spoke, still more copious tears welled up in the eyes of the glorious young men. All three brothers did what they could to solace him, and they told him, "Let the funeral libation be offered to Father, the master of the world." When Sita heard that her father-in-law the king had gone to heaven, tears so flooded her eyes that she no longer could see her husband. As the daughter of Jánaka wept, Rama comforted her. Lost in sorrow he then said sorrowfully to Lákshmana: "Bring me a cake of almond meal and fetch an upper garment of bark cloth. I will go to make the funeral libation for our great father. Let Sita proceed in front, and you next, while I go at the rear, for such is the procession of mourning." Their constant attendant, the celebrated Sumántra, a high-minded and gentle man, self-restrained, tranquil and staunchly devoted to Rama, joined the princes in solacing Rághava. Then, lending support, he escorted him down to the gracious Mandákini River. 95.20

In pain the glorious princes made their way to the charming bathing place on the lovely Mandákini River, where the woodlands were always in flower, and the current ran swiftly. And on reaching the landing, gracious and sparkling clear, they sprinkled water for the king with the words, “Father, let this be for you.” 95.25

The protector of the earth held out a handful of water, and facing the direction of Yama he said, weeping: “O tiger among kings, may this pure water I now give you be at your disposal in the world of the ancestors and abide forever.” Mighty Rághava then ascended from the bathing place on the Mandákini and in the company of his brothers made the offering of food to his father. Upon a spread of darbha grass Rama deposited the cake of almond meal mixed with fruit of the jujube tree. And weeping in the anguish of his deep sorrow, he said: “Be pleased to eat this, great king, such food as we ourselves now eat, for a man’s gods must feed on the same food as he.” 95.30

The tiger among men ascended from the riverbank and by the same way he had come climbed up the lovely slope of the mountain. On reaching the door of his leaf-hut the lord of the world clasped both Bhárata and Lákshmana in his arms. All the brothers and Vaidéhi began to weep, and the mountain echoed with the sound, as of lions roaring. Bhárata’s soldiers were alarmed when they heard the tumultuous sound. “Bhárata must surely have met with Rama,” they said. “The loud sound must be their grieving over their dead father.” With one mind they all left their camps and raced off in the direction of the noise, following where it led them. Some went on horses or elephants, others—the 95.35

All the people rushed to the ashram, yearning to see Rama, for, though his absence had been brief, it had seemed so very long. Yearning to see the reunion of the brothers, they hurried off on every sort of vehicle, in a flurry of hoofs and wheels. Struck by the hoofs and wheels of the many vehicles, the earth gave off a tumultuous sound, like the heavens when storm clouds gather. The sound frightened the bull elephants and the cows in their train, and they ran off to another part of the forest, perfuming the way with their scent. Boars, deer, lions, buffaloes, apes, monkeys, tigers, cow-eared antelopes and wild oxen were terrified, as well as the dappled antelopes. Sheldrakes, moorhens, geese, ducks, plovers, cuckoos and curlews took to the horizons in a blind rush. The sky appeared to be as covered with birds frightened at the sound as did the earth with men. 95.40

Righteous Rama then caught sight of the tearful, sorrowing men, and like a father or a mother he embraced them. The prince embraced some men, while others did obeisance to him; his presence restored to all of them, each according to his station, their one true kinsman or one true friend. The great men wept, and the noise made earth and heaven echo incessantly, through the mountain caves and in all directions, with a sound like the roll of bass drums. 95.45

spied the bathing place Rama and Lákshmana frequented. Kausálya's throat was choked with sobs, and her mouth went dry as she spoke in her desolation to Sumíttra and the other wives of the king: "This must be where they come to bathe—poor children. It has recently been disturbed by them, whom nothing had ever disturbed before. Once it was deserted, off here in the forest—but they have been driven from their country! It must be from here, Sumíttra, 96.5 that your son Saumíttri, constantly and without flagging, has to fetch water himself on my son's behalf."

On the ground the large-eyed woman saw the cake of almond meal for the father deposited upon the darbha grass, whose blades pointed toward the south. And when Queen Kausálya observed what had been deposited on the ground by Rama in anguish for his father, she said to all of Dasha-ratha's women: "Look at this. It was offered by Rághava according to precept to his father, the great Rághava, the leader of the Ikshvákus. But how unseemly a food I find it for the great and godlike king, who enjoyed so many 96.10 delicacies. He had the whole four-cornered earth for his enjoyment; he was great Indra's equal on earth. How is it possible that the lord of the land has now but a cake of almond meal for food? No greater sorrow than this has the world to show me, that the once-prosperous Rama should have only such meal to offer his father. And I have before my very eyes the cake Rama offered his father—how is it, then, my heart does not burst for sorrow into a thousand pieces?"

Such were her anguished words, and her co-wives tried to comfort her. They continued on, then, and soon caught sight of Rama in the ashram, resembling a deathless god fallen from heaven. As his mothers gazed at Rama, who was denied now every luxury, they were anguished and racked with grief and broke out in shrill weeping. Rama, tiger 96.15 among men, a man always true to his promise, rose and clasped the lovely feet of all his mothers. And the large-eyed women brushed the dust from his back with their lovely hands, with their soft fingers and palms so pleasant to the touch. Saumítri, too, was overcome with sorrow as he gazed at all his mothers. He did obeisance to them after Rama, slowly and clingingly. And all the women treated good Lákshmana, a son born of Dasha-ratha, exactly as they treated Rama.

Sita, too, sorrowfully grasped the feet of her mothers-in-law and stood before them, her eyes brimming with tears. Just as a mother would embrace her own daughter, Kausálya 96.20 embraced Sita as she stood anguished with sorrow, desolate and haggard from her stay in the forest. And she said to her: "How is it possible that the daughter of the king of Vidéha, the daughter-in-law of Dasha-ratha, the wife of Rama, should have to live a life of pain in the desolate forest? Your face is like a lotus scorched by sunshine, like a withered lily, or gold caked with dirt, or the moon obscured by clouds, and as I look at it, grief consumes me as fire consumes its bed—a wild grief, here, in my heart, Vaidéhi, kindled by this calamity."

As his mother was speaking in her anguish, Bhárata's elder brother made his way to Vasíshta and clasped his feet. Rághava grasped the feet of the fiery and brilliant family priest just as Indra, overlord of the deathless gods, might grasp Brihas·pati's, and together they took their seats. Lastly, righteous Bhárata sat down near his elder brother, and with him sat the counsellors, the leading men of the city, the soldiers and the people most wise in the ways of righteousness. As mighty Bhárata sat next to him and gazed at him dressed as an ascetic, yet radiant with majesty, he humbly cupped his hands in reverence, like great Indra before Praja·pati. "Just what will Bhárata say to Rághava now, after bowing to him and showing him honor?" the nobles wondered and waited with truly great curiosity. Surrounded by their friends the brothers sat—truthful Rághava, high-minded Lákshmana and righteous Bhárata—like the three fires at a sacred rite with the officiants gathered all around. 96.25

NOW, WHEN RAMA had comforted his brother Bhárata, who so cherished his guru, he and his brother Lákshmana began to question him: "I should like to hear from your own lips what all this means, why you have come to this region in bark cloth, hides and matted hair. For what reason did you leave the kingdom and enter this region wearing black hides and matted hair? Please, tell me everything." 97.1

his hands in reverence once more, and, holding them out stiffly, replied: "It was grave wrongdoing for our great-armed father to repudiate my noble brother. And grief for his son so tortured him that he went to heaven. Under the constraint of a woman—my mother, Kaikéyi—he committed this great evil, slayer of foes, which robbed him of his glory. But my mother never achieved her goal, the kingship. And now she is a widow racked with grief, who must fall into the most abominable hell. Please show your grace to me, your slave. Have yourself consecrated, like Indra the munificent, into the kingship this very day. All these subjects and your widowed mothers have betaken themselves to you. Please, show them your grace. 97.5

It is proper both by reason of succession and by virtue of the man himself. O giver of honor, assume the kingship as is right, and grant your loved ones their desire. Let the earth be a widow no more, but once again complete, with you as her husband, just as the autumn night is made complete by the bright, hare-marked moon. I and all the advisers here are begging you with heads bowed low. Tiger among men, please, show your grace to me, your brother, your pupil and slave, and do not transgress against this whole order of advisers, this ancient, hereditary and venerable order." With these tearful words Bhárata, the great-armed son of Kaikéyi, pressed his head once more to Rama's feet. 97.10

And as his brother Bhárata stood heaving sighs like an elephant in rut, Rama embraced him and replied: "You are highborn, valorous and mighty, and keep your vows. How would it be possible for one such as you ever to do evil for the sake of kingship? I find no fault with you, crusher of foes, 97.15

It is for you to assume the kingship in Ayódhya, held in honor by the world. I must live in the Dándaka wilderness, wearing clothes of bark cloth. Such was the apportionment the great king made in the presence of all the world. And after giving his orders, the mighty Dasha-ratha went to heaven. The righteous king, the guru of the world, must be your guide. You must accept what Father bestowed, whatever your portion. For my part, dear brother, I will accept the portion bestowed by our great father and withdraw for fourteen years to the Dándaka wilderness. It is what my great father—who was held in honor by the men of the world, the peer of Indra, overlord of the wise gods—bade me do that I regard as my ultimate good, not sovereign lordship over all the worlds.” 97.20

THE LIONS AMONG men continued to grieve in the company of their hosts of friends, and the night passed, painfully. When night had brightened into dawn, his brothers performed the morning offering and prayers by the Mandákini in the company of their friends, and then returned to Rama. They sat together in silence, no one saying a word, until, from where he sat among their friends, Bhárata addressed Rama: 98.1

“My mother has been satisfied; the kingship has been bestowed on me. And I bestow it on you, and you alone. Enjoy unchallenged kingship. Like a dike washed away by a great flood when the rains come, the kingdom will utterly disintegrate unless you prevent it, and no one else can. An ass cannot match the pace of a horse, birds cannot match Tar-kshya’s pace, nor have I the power to match yours, lord of the land. Life is ever easy when it is others who must depend on you, but how hard life is, Rama, when you must depend on others. It is like when a man plants a tree and nurtures it till it becomes a great tree with spreading branches, impossible for a short man to climb. When the tree comes into flower but shows no fruit—the whole purpose for which it was grown—the man fails to take any pleasure in it. This is a simile, my great-armed brother—and you will easily grasp its meaning—for your not ruling over us, a mighty master over his servants. Let the guildsmen, O great king, and all the leading subjects behold you installed in the kingship, tamer of foes, blazing like the sun. Let rutting elephants trumpet in your entourage, Kakútstha; let the women of the inner chamber rejoice with all their hearts.” 98.5 98.10

The various classes of townspeople approved as just the words they heard Bhárata speak in supplication of Rama. Accomplished Rama gazed at glorious Bhárata lamenting in his sorrow, and in full self-possession tried to comfort him:

“No one acts of his own free will; man is not independent. This way and that he is pulled along by fate. All accumulation ends in depletion, all rising ends in falling, in separation all union ends, and all life ends in death. Just as ripe fruit need fear one thing—to fall—so every man that is born need fear but death. Just as a stout-pillared house decays and collapses, so men collapse, succumbing to old age and death. The passing days and nights quickly deplete the life of all living things in the world, as water is dried up by the rays of the summer sun. 98.15

You should be grieving for yourself, not for anyone else. 98.20
Your life is steadily dwindling, whether you stand still or move. Death walks at your side, death sits next to you. Travel as far away as you like, death will come back with you. Wrinkles beset the body, the hair turns white; a man decays with old age, and what can he do to escape it?

People are glad when the sun rises, or glad when it goes down, but they are wholly unaware that their life is slipping away. All things that breathe are delighted to see the face of each new season come, though with the turning of the seasons their life-breath is slipping away. As two pieces of wood might meet upon the open sea and, having met, drift apart after a few brief moments, so too do your wives and children, your relatives and riches meet with you and hasten away. To lose them is a certainty. 98.25

No creature that draws breath in the world can escape this course of things. There is no cure to be found for it, grieve for the dead all you will. Like a man standing by the roadside and calling out to a passing caravan, ‘I too am coming, right behind you’—so did our ancestors take this sure road, our fathers and our forefathers. Why should you grieve when you cannot avoid it, when you are following that very road yourself? Since life trickles away like the waters of a stream, never to return, happiness should be one's aim—and people have found happiness, or so it is recorded. By means of every holy rite, with fitting priestly stipends, our righteous father, the lord of earth, cleansed away his sins and went to heaven. Our father conscientiously supported his dependents, protected his subjects, levied taxes in accordance with righteousness, and by virtue of these acts he has gone to the highest heaven. Having offered up the various sacrifices and enjoyed abundant pleasures, the lord of earth attained a ripe old age and went to heaven. Our father abandoned a decrepit mortal body and found the heavenly treasure that awaits one in the world of Brahma. 98.30

This man no one should mourn, no one as wise as you, as learned and intelligent. The strong of heart will shun these different griefs, these words of lamentation, this weeping, and hold fast to wisdom in all circumstances. Compose yourself and do not grieve, most eloquent of men. Go back and take up your residence in the town, as Father of his own accord directed you to do. And the order this same man of holy deeds has given me I shall carry out, and exactly where our noble father directed. It would be wrong, tamer of foes, for me to cast aside his order. And you too must always respect it, for he was our kinsman, indeed, our father.” 98.35

You are esteemed by the elders, you have questioned them about your doubts and gained these insights about the living and the dead, and how alike they are in their existing and not existing both. What is there that could distress you? Such a man does not despair when calamity befalls him. Your courage is like that of a deathless god; you are a great man true to your word. You are all-knowing and all-seeing and a man of wisdom, Rághava. In possession of such virtues and sage in matters of birth and death, you would not be affected by sorrow, however insufferable. 98.45

When I was absent, my mother, that wretched woman, did an evil thing on my account, which I never sought. Please forgive me! I am bound by the bond of righteousness, and only because of that do I not inflict the harshest punishment now on my mother and kill her, as she deserves, for the evil she has done. How could I, a son born of Dasha-ratha—that man of honorable family and honorable deeds—knowing the meaning of righteousness, do a deed so abominable, so unrighteous? I would not reproach our father before the assembly; he was a god to us, a performer of sacred rites, our guru, elder, king and father, now departed. But still, my righteous brother, what man knowing the meaning of righteousness would do so sinful a deed, contrary to all that is right and good, just to please a woman? 98.50

Mindful of what is correct, you must redress the transgression Father committed out of anger, delusion and recklessness. Only the offspring who corrects his father's transgressions does the world consider a son—and the very opposite if he does otherwise. Be such a son, do not endorse the evil deed Father did, censured by every man of wisdom in the world.

kinsmen, all the people of the city and provinces, this whole world. How incongruous they are, this wilderness and the kshátriya order, this matted hair and the government of men. You must not do so perverse a deed. Or, if it is your wish to follow the way of righteousness that demands physical exhaustion, then endure the exhaustion of righteously governing the four social orders. Those who understand righteousness—and you yourself understand it—say that of the four stages of life the foremost is that of householder. How can you renounce it?

I am a child measured against you, both in learning and rank of birth. How should I govern the land when you are on hand to do it? I am a child, inferior in both virtue and intel- 98.60

In keeping with the code of righteousness appropriate for you, my righteous brother, govern the kingdom of our fathers, this whole, sovereign, unchallenged kingdom, in the company of your kinsmen. Let all the subjects in a body, and the priests under Vasíshta's lead who are expert in Vedic recitation, consecrate you here and now to the accompaniment of the Vedic hymns. Once we have consecrated you, return and protect Ayódhya, utterly triumphant over all peoples, like Vāsava with his Maruts. Discharge the three debts: completely eliminate your enemies, fulfill your friends' every desire, and give me guidance, as you alone can.

My brother, let your friends now find delight in your consecration, let your enemies now take fright and flee in the ten directions. Bull among men, rid us now of this infamy, me and my mother, and guard our revered father from sin. I implore you with my head bowed low. Take pity on me, on all your kinsmen, as the Great Lord takes pity on creatures. But if you only turn your back and go off into the forest, I will go with you as well.” 98.65

But for all that Bhārata wearied himself begging Rama's grace with head bowed low, the courageous lord of earth was resolved not to return, but to hold firmly to what his father had bidden him. The people observed Rāghava's wonderful determination, and they felt joy and sorrow both at once: they were sorrowful he would not return to Ayódhya and yet rejoiced to observe how determined he was to keep his promise. The priests, the merchants and the commanders of the troops—his mothers, too, stunned though they were and choked with sobs—commended what Bhārata said, and they bowed low before Rama and began to implore him all together. 98.70

WHEN BHÁRATA HAD finished speaking, Lákshmana's majestic eldest brother, the most honored among his kinsmen, replied to him once more: 99.1

“How fitting are the words you have spoken, like a true son of Kaikéyi and Dasha-ratha, the best of kings. Long ago, dear brother, when our father was about to marry your mother, he made a bride-price pledge to your grandfather—the ultimate price, the kingship. Later, at the battle of the gods and ásuras, the lordly king of the land, pleased and delighted with your mother, granted her a boon. Your glorious fair-skinned mother then bound the best of men to his oath and demanded these two boons of him: the kingship for you, tiger among men, and my banishment. And under this constraint the king granted her the boon. 99.5

And that is why, bull among men, father constrained me to do this, to live in the forest fourteen years, in accordance with the granting of the boon. And I for my part have come here, to the lonely forest, with Lákshmana and Sita, and I will brook no opposition to my safeguarding Father’s truthfulness. In just the same way you must likewise ensure, by your immediate consecration, that the truth of the lord of kings, our father, be preserved. Free the lordly king from his debt, for my sake, righteous Bhárata. Save your father and give your mother cause to rejoice. They recite a verse sung long ago, dear brother, by glorious Gaya when he was offering sacrifice to his ancestors in the land of Gaya: ‘Because a son rescues his father from the hell named Put, he is called putra; or because he protects his ancestors. One should strive to have many virtuous and learned sons, for among such a host perhaps one might be found who will make the journey to Gaya.’ 99.10

I will enter Dándaka wilderness without delay, your majesty, and only these two shall join me, Vaidéhi and Lákshmana. It is you, Bhárata, who must become the king of men. As for me, I shall become sovereign king of the beasts of the wild. Go now in delight, to the best of cities, and in delight I too shall go off to the Dándakas. Let the royal parasol cast its cool shade over your head, blocking out the rays of the sun, bringer of day. I shall have shade as well to retreat to for comfort, the deeper shade of these woodland trees. Quick-witted Shatrúghna will be your companion and trustworthy Saumítri my chief ally. Let all four of us, his principal sons, preserve the truth of the lord of men. Do not despair.” 99.15

AS RIGHTEOUS RAMA was consoling Bhárata, a prominent brahman named Jabáli addressed him in words at variance with righteousness: 100.1

“Come now, Rághava, you must not entertain such nonsensical ideas like the commonest of men, and you a noble-minded man in distress. What man is kin to anyone, what profit has anyone in anyone else? A person is born alone, and all alone he must die. And thus, Rama, the man who feels attachment thinking, ‘This is my mother, this my father,’ should be regarded as a madman, for in truth no one belongs to anyone. place where he stopped and continue on—in the same way, Kakútstha, his father and mother, his home and wealth are mere stopping places for a man. The wise feel no attachment to them.

You must not, best of men, abdicate the kingship of your fathers and embark upon this unwise course, painful, rocky and full of thorns. Consecrate yourself in prosperous Ayódhya; the city is waiting for you, wearing her single braid of hair.

Indulge in priceless royal pleasures and enjoy yourself in Ayódhya, prince, like Shakra in his heaven. Dasha-ra- 100.10

You are merely deluding yourself. The men I grieve for, and I grieve for no one else, are all who place ‘righteousness’ above what brings them profit. They find only sorrow in this world, and at death their lot is annihilation just the same.

People here busy themselves because ‘It is the Eighth Day, the rite for the ancestors.’ But just look at the waste of food—what really is a dead man going to eat? And if something one person eats here could fill the belly of someone else, one could simply offer shraddha for a traveler, and he would need no provisions for the road. It was only as 100.15

UPON HEARING JABÁLI’S words, Rama, the most truthful of men, replied with sound argument, his own convictions quite unshaken: 101.1

“What you have said in the hope of pleasing me is wrong with only a semblance of right; it is harm that simulates help. A person wins no esteem among the wise when his conduct belies his tenets, and he acts in evil ways, recognizing no bounds. It is conduct alone that proclaims whether a man is highborn or base, honest or dishonest, brave or merely a braggart. It would be ignobility with a semblance of nobility, dishonesty with an outward show of honesty, dishonor masquerading as honor, indecency disguised as decency, were I to reject the good and accept such unrighteousness. For it merely wears the cloak of righteousness; it would throw the world into confusion, and is utterly in conflict with duty and precept. 101.5

What sensible man anywhere in the world, aware of what is right and wrong, would hold me in high esteem—a man of evil acts, a corrupter of the world? To whose actions should I be conforming, and how then should I reach heaven, were I to adopt this practice and break my promise? Besides, the entire world would follow suit in acting as it pleases, for subjects will behave just like their king. The actions of a king must always be truthful and benevolent. The kingdom will thereby be true, the world firmly established on truth. It is truth and truth alone that both gods and seers hold in esteem, for the man who tells the truth in this world will attain the highest abode. As from a serpent do people recoil from a man who speaks falsely. Truth, it is said, is the ultimate form of righteousness in this world, and the very root of heaven. Truth is the lord of this world, the goddess of the lotus resides in truth, all things are rooted in truth, there is no higher goal than truth. 101.10

The giving of alms, sacrifices, the offering of oblations, the practice of asceticism, and the Vedas themselves are based on truth, and so it is truth that must be one's highest aim. One man protects the world, one protects his House, one is exalted in heaven, and one sinks down to hell. As for me, why should I not truthfully follow my father's command? I have always been true to my word, and I have pledged upon my truth. Not out of greed or delusion or ignorance would I blindly breach the dam of truth. I will remain true to my promise to my guru. Neither the gods nor the ancestors, we have heard, accept offerings from a man whose covenant is false, from an inconstant and irresolute man. This personal code of righteousness I know myself to be the true one. Wise men have always borne the burden it imposes, and I gladly accept it. 101.15

I reject the kshátriya's code, where unrighteousness and righteousness go hand in hand, a code that only debased, vicious, covetous and evil men observe. And sinful action is of three sorts: One can have evil thoughts, or do an evil deed, or tell a lie. Land, fame, glory and wealth seek out the man who holds to truth and ever attend on him. Let a man then devote himself to truth alone. 101.20

What you consider the best course is in fact ignoble; the statements you make urging me to 'do what is good for me' are mere sophistry. I have promised my guru to live in the forest. How then can I do as Bhárata bids, and defy the bidding of my guru? I made a promise in the presence of my guru—it brought delight to the heart of Queen Kaikéyi—and that promise shall not be broken. I will thus live a life of purity in the forest, restricting my food to holy things, roots, fruit and flowers, and gods and ancestors. My five senses will have contentment enough, and I shall be maintaining the world on its course. Moreover, I myself shall remain a sincere believer, fully aware of what is right and what is wrong. 101.25

On entering this realm of action one must do good deeds. And such deeds have their rewards; Fire, Wind and the Moon have reaped them. After Indra brought a hundred rites to completion he became king of the gods in the highest heaven. After performing awesome feats of asceticism the great seers reached heaven.

Truthfulness, righteousness and strenuous effort, compassion for creatures and kindly words, reverence for brahmanas, gods and guests is the path, say the wise, to the highest heaven. Those men who are earnest in righteousness and keep company with the wise, who are supremely generous, 101.30

you. I want you now, master of the world, to learn from me the origin of this world. Everything was once just water, and within this water the earth was fashioned. The Self-existent Brahma then came into existence with the gods.
He then became a boar, raised up the treasure-laden earth, and created the whole moving world with the help of his accomplished sons. Brahma the everlasting, the eternal and imperishable, arose from space. He begot Maríchi, and Maríchi a son named Káshyapa. Káshyapa begot Vivasván, the 102.5 Sun. Manu is recorded as the son of Vivasván—he was the first lord of creatures—and the son of Manu was Ikshváku.

It was on him that Manu originally bestowed this prosperous land, and thus know that Ikshváku was the first king of Ayódhya.

The son of Ikshváku, we have heard, was majestic Kukshi, and Kukshi was the father of the heroic Vikúkshi. The son of Vikúkshi was the mighty, powerful Bana, and Bana’s son, the great-armed, glorious Anaránya. When Anaránya, the best of men, was king, there was no drought, no famine and not a single thief in the land. Anaránya had a 102.10 great-armed son, King Prithu. Prithu was the father of the great king Tri-shanku, that heroic man who by virtue of his truthfulness went to heaven with his body. Tri-shanku had a glorious son, Dhundhu-mara, and Dhundhu-mara begot glorious Yuvanáshva.

Yuvanáshva was the father of majestic Mandhátri, and Mandhátri the father of mighty Susándhi. Susándhi had two sons, Dhruva-sandhi and Prasénajit. Dhruva-sandhi had a son named Bhárata, a glorious crusher of foes. To great-armed Bhárata was born a son named Ásita, against whom neighboring kings rose up in enmity: the Háihayas, the Tala-janghas, the Shuras and the Shasha-bindus.

The king marshalled his troops in battle against them all, 102.15 but he was driven into exile and became a contented sage upon a lovely mountain. He had two wives, both of whom were pregnant, we have heard. A man of the Bhrigu clan named Shasha-bindu had retired to the Himalayas, and Kálindi once approached the seer and did obeisance to him. She was eager to obtain a boon for the birth of a son, and the sage greeted her. The queen then went home and soon gave birth to a son.

Her co-wife had given her poison in order to slay the unborn child, but he was born nonetheless along with that very poison, and so they called him Ságara. This was the King Ságara who in the course of a sacrifice had the ocean dug, which even now frightens creatures when it swells under the full moon. Asamáñja, we have heard, was the son of Ságara, 102.20 but in the very prime of life he was expelled by his father for the evil deeds he had done. Heroic Amshumánt was the son of Asamáñja, Dilípa was the son of Amshumánt, and Bhagi-ratha of Dilípa. Bhagi-ratha was the father of Kakútstha, from whom you have come to be known as the Kakútstha, Kakútstha's son was Raghu, whence you are called the Rághavas. Raghu's mighty son was the awesome eater of men known throughout the world as Kalmásha-pada Saudása.

The son of Kalmásha-pada was called Shánkhana, and whoever came up against his might perished utterly with his army. The son of Shánkhana was heroic, majestic Sudárshana, Sudárshana's son Agni-varna, Agni-varna's son Shíghraga. Shíghraga's son was Maru, Maru's son was Prashúshruka, Prashúshruka's son the splendid Ambarísha. Ambarísha's son was valorous Náhusa, Náhusa's son the supremely righteous Nabhága. Aja and Súvrata were the two sons of Nabhága, and Aja's son was righteous King Dasha-ratha. 102.25

And you, known far and wide as Rama, are his eldest son and heir. Assume, then, the kingship that is your own and show regard for the world, your majesty. For among all the Ikshvákus the firstborn has always become the king. When the firstborn is living, it is not a younger son but only the eldest who is consecrated for kingship. This is the age-old custom of your own house, the House of the Rághavas, and you must not abandon it now. You must govern the earth with its abundant treasures and abundant vassal kingdoms, and like your father win great fame." 102.30

WHEN VASÍSHTHA, THE family priest of the king, had finished this speech, he once more addressed Rama in harmony with righteousness: 103.1

“A man born into this world has three gurus, Rághava Kakútstha: his teacher, his father and his mother. The father begets the man, bull among men, but the teacher imparts wisdom to him, and for this reason he is called guru. I was your father’s teacher and am yours, too, slayer of foes; in doing my bidding you will not stray from the path of the good. Here are the men of your assembly and the guildsmen gathered together; in practicing righteousness on their behalf, my son, you will not stray from the path of the good. Your mother is aged and righteous, and you must not disobey her; in doing as she bids you will not stray from the path of the good. If you do as Bhárata bade when supplicating you, Rághava, you will not go astray in your pursuit of truth and righteousness.” 103.5

Addressed in this gentle fashion by his guru, Rághava, bull among men, for his part replied to Vasishtha, who sat beside him: “The constant benefits parents confer upon their child are not easily repaid—all that a mother and father do, giving him things to the limit of their resources, bathing and clothing him, always speaking kindly to him and nurturing him, too. King Dasha-ratha was my father, he begot me, and the promise I made to him shall not be rendered false.”

So Rama spoke, and noble Bhárata, in great distress, addressed the charioteer who was waiting in attendance: “Charioteer, spread some kusha grass on the ground for me at once; I will fast against my brother, until he shows me his grace. Eating nothing, seeing nothing, like a penniless brahman, I will lie before the hut until he consents to return.” He watched in distress as Sumántra remained with his eyes 103.15 fixed on Rama, and then he procured a layer of kusha grass himself and spread it on the earth.

Mighty Rama, the best of royal seers, said to him, "What have I done, dear Bhárata, that you should fast against me? A brahman may have the right to coerce men by lying on his side, but there is no precept permitting those whose heads are anointed to fast against anyone. So stand up, Rághava, tiger among men, and abandon this heartless vow. You must leave at once for Ayódhya, the best of cities." But Bhárata remained seated and, looking all around at the people of the city and provinces, he cried, "Why do you not remonstrate with my brother?" And the people of the city and provinces 103.20 then said to the great prince, "We recognize that what Rághava is telling Kakútstha is correct. But then, too, this illustrious man is holding firm to what his father bade him do. That is why we are truly incapable of dissuading him."

Hearing their words, Rama said, "Listen to the words of our friends, who see with the eye of righteousness. You have heard from both sides now. Consider it well, Rághava. Stand up, my great-armed brother, touch me and sip water." Bhárata then stood up, took a sip of water, and said, "Hear me, men of the assembly, you counsellors and guildsmen, too. I 103.25 did not ask my father for the kingship; I gave my mother no instructions. But I do recognize that my noble brother Rághava is supremely wise in the ways of righteousness. Thus, if someone must live here, if father's bidding must be done, I myself will live out the fourteen years in the forest."

Righteous Rama marvelled at his brother's forthright declaration, and glancing at the people of the city and provinces he said, "What my father in his lifetime bought or sold or pledged neither Bhárata nor I can in any way annul. I cannot allow a substitute to live in the forest; that would be repugnant to me. What Kaikéyi asked was proper; what my father did was rightly done. I know Bhárata is forbearing and shows his gurus honor. All will be perfectly safe in his care, for he is a great prince and true to his word. When I return from the forest I shall rejoin my righteous brother and become supreme lord of the earth. Kaikéyi made her demand of the king, and I have done her bidding and saved my father, the lord of earth, from falsehood." 103.30

THE GREAT SEERS who had assembled to watch marvelled, thrilled by the meeting of the two incomparably mighty brothers. The hosts of seers, perfected beings and supreme seers remained invisible as they sang the praises of the two brothers, the great Kakútsthas. “Fortunate the man who has such sons as these, sons who know and follow the way of righteousness. How envious we are after hearing their conversation.” Then all at once the hosts of seers, eager for the destruction of ten-necked Ravana, spoke to Bhárata, tiger among kings. “You are a wise and highborn prince, a man of great rectitude and glory. If you have any regard for your father, you must agree to what Rama says. It is our wish that Rama forever keep his father free from debt. It is because Dasha-ratha was free from his debt to Kaikéyi that he has gone to heaven.” Saying no more, the gandhárvas, great seers and royal seers all departed for their separate abodes. 104.1 104.5

Splendid Rama was gladdened by these splendid words, and his face beamed with delight as he paid homage to the seers. But Bhárata went limp in every limb. He cupped his hands in reverence and, in a breaking voice, once more addressed Raghava:

“Please, show regard for the code of kings and the traditional code of our House. Oh Kakútstha, grant what we beg of you, your mother and I. I cannot, all by myself, protect this vast kingdom. Nor can I win the loyalty of the people of the city and provinces; their loyalty is already fixed. It is for you alone our kinsmen and soldiers, our allies and friends are yearning, as farmers yearn for rain. Oh my wise brother, accept the kingship and restore its stability. You 104.10

Rama gathered his brother Bhárata, dark and lotus-eyed, into his embrace, and in a voice like the call of the wild goose he said: 104.15

“You have the wisdom in your possession, innately and from your training, dear brother; you too are perfectly capable of protecting the land. Take counsel with your ministers, your friends and wise counsellors, and you shall see all matters accomplished, however great they may be. The moon’s splendor might forsake it, Himálaya might lose its snow, the ocean might overstep its shore, but not I my promise to my father. Whether it was love or greed that made your mother act as she did on your behalf, dear brother, should be none of your concern. You must treat her as what she is—your mother.”

So the son of Kausályá spoke, his brilliance like the sun’s, his face like the waxing moon. And Bhárata then said to him: 104.20

“Please place these gold-trimmed slippers upon your feet, my brother. They will serve to guarantee the security of all the world.” The mighty tiger among men put on the slippers. Then, taking them off, he presented them to great Bhárata. The mighty and righteous Bhárata accepted the ornamented slippers, and after reverently circling Rághava he placed them atop a splendid elephant. Rama paid homage to his people in due order: to his gurus and counsellors, to the subjects and both his younger brothers. Then the heir of the Rághava dynasty dismissed them, standing firmly as Mount Himálaya by his own code of righteousness. In 104.25 their sorrow, his mothers could not bid him farewell, their throats were so choked with sobs, but Rama did obeisance to them all and then entered his hut, in tears.

BHÁRATA TOOK THE SLIPPERS and placed them upon his 105.1

They passed the lovely Mandákiní River, heading east and keeping great Mount Chitra-kuta on their right. In the company of his army, Bhárata made his way along the mountainside, observing the thousands of lovely different minerals it held. Not far from Chitra-kuta Bhárata caught 105.5

So the wise Bharad·vaja spoke, and Bhárata, who cherished the ways of righteousness, replied: "Both his guru and I entreated the steadfast Rághava, but he was deeply displeased and made this reply to Vasíshtha: 'I will scrupulously keep 105.10 these gold-trimmed slippers. In your stead they will ensure the welfare and security of Ayódhya.’ So Vasíshtha spoke, and Rághava stood facing eastward and bestowed on me these gold-worked slippers, in order to rule the kingdom. Great Rama gave me leave, and now I am returning. I am going back to Ayódhya, taking the splendid slippers with me.”

The sage Bharad·vaja listened to the earnest words of great Bhárata, and then even more earnestly he replied: “It is not surprising, tiger among men, most upright and dutiful of men, that nobility should come to reside in you, like rainwater in the lowlands. Your great-armed father Dasharatha is not dead, not when he has such a son as you, a righteous son who cherishes the ways of righteousness.” When the great seer finished speaking, Bhárata cupped his hands in reverence, and in preparation for bidding him farewell he clasped his feet. Again and again majestic Bhárata reverently circled Bharad·vaja, and then, with his counsellors, he set out for Ayódhya. 105.15

Spread far and wide with all its coaches, wagons, horses and elephants, the army made its way back in Bhárata’s train. They all crossed the heavenly, wave-wreathed Yámu-na River, and saw once more the gracious waters of the Ganges. Crossing the river brimming with lovely water, he and his kinsmen and army entered lovely Shringa·vera·pura. Beyond Shringa·vera·pura, Bhárata once more beheld Ayódhya, and he was consumed with sorrow as he said to his charioteer: “Look, charioteer, Ayódhya is darkened and in ruins. Its beauty is gone, its bliss is gone, it is desolate and silent.” 105.20

THE COACH GAVE OUT a smooth deep sound as the glorious and lordly Bhárata approached and directly entered Ayódhya. There were cats roaming everywhere, and owls circling; the people and elephants were in hiding, and the city lay shrouded in gloom. It lay dark as night itself with no light at all. 106.1

It looked like the constellation Róhini, the majestically radiant and beloved wife of the Moon, the enemy of Rahu, when that seizing eclipse encroaches and harries her left all alone; Like a wasted mountain river, its water scant, hot and turbid, the birds dazed by summer's heat, the minnows, fish and crocodiles lying hidden deep below; Like a flame that has leaped from the sacrificial fire, smokeless and golden when the oblation was poured, then abruptly snuffed out; Like an army routed in a great battle, its armaments in ruins, its horses and elephants slaughtered, its chariots and standards shattered, its heroes slain; 106.5

Like a great wave raised foaming and roaring on the open sea and then, when the wind dies down, dispersed into silence; Like an altar after the worthy sacrificers have left with all their sacrificial implements, the hour of the soma pressing has come and gone, and the din has ceased; Like a herd of cows in the middle of a pasture when their bull has left them, and they no longer graze the new grass but are anguished and wistful; Like a new pearl necklace when its precious gems have come unstrung, the most perfect, smooth, radiant, glistening gems; Like a star suddenly tottering from its place when its merit is exhausted, and falling from heaven down to earth, its expansive luster dimmed; Like a woodland vine at the end of spring, decked with 106.10 flowers and swarming with drunken bees, then scorched by a racing forest fire and withered.

All the merchants were in a daze, the bazaars and shops closed up tight, and the city looked like the night sky covered with clouds, the hare-marked moon and constellations obscured; Like a rowdy tavern littered with smashed goblets, the costly drinks drained, and the patrons lying in the open, dead drunk; Like a ruined well, sunken and broken, its water used up, its pavement cracked, its buckets cracked and scattered all around; Like a bowstring, once long and taut and fitted out with loops, fallen from the bow to the ground when cut by a champion's arrows; Like a filly stripped of all her trappings and wildly whipped on by a battle-drunk rider, a weak filly, one that should still be running free; Like the radiance of the sun gone behind a bank of clouds when the driving rains come, and the blue-black clouds obscure it. 106.15

The charioteer drove the excellent chariot onward, and seated inside, Bhárata, Dasha-ratha's majestic son, addressed him:

"Why, I wonder, are the deep, pervasive sounds of singing and musical instruments not coming from Ayódhya now, as they always used to? The heady fragrance of wine, the pervading fragrance of garlands and the fragrance of aloe-wood incense are no longer carried on the breeze. The clangor of fine carriages, the rich sound of horses, the trumpeting of rutting elephants and the deafening sound of chariots are no longer to be heard in the city, now that Rama is in exile. No people are to be seen thronging together on Ayódhya's thoroughfares, neither the youngsters in their finery nor the adults with their stately step." 106.20

With these and many similar comments he entered his father's residence, bereft now of the lord of men like a cave without its lion.

AFTER RESETTLING HIS mothers in Ayódhya, the grief-stricken Bhárata, firm in his vows, addressed his gurus: “I have come to ask leave of you all; I am going to Nandigrama. There I shall suffer through all this sorrow of being without Rághava. With the king gone to heaven and my guru in the forest, I shall await Rama until he assumes the kingship, for he is the glorious king.” When they heard great Bhárata's heartfelt declaration, Vasíshta the family priest and all the counsellors replied: “These are seemly and praiseworthy words you have spoken out of love for your brother, Bhárata, and they befit you. Keeping to the noble way, always zealous on your kinsmen's behalf, and steadfast in your brotherly love—whose approval could you fail to win?” On hearing the kind words of the counsellors, all that he could hope for, he bade the charioteer, “Harness my chariot.”

The face of the majestic prince beamed with delight as he did obeisance to all his mothers and boarded the chariot with Shatrúghna. Once aboard, Bhárata and Shatrúghna sped off in great joy, together with their counsellors and family priest. Before them went all their gurus, the brahmins led by Vasíshta, heading east toward Nandigrama. And altogether unbidden, the army, a crush of elephants, horses and chariots, set off as Bhárata left, and so did all the inhabitants of the town. Righteous Bhárata, who cherished his brother, hurried in his chariot to Nandi·grama, still bearing the slippers upon his head.

Soon Bhárata entered Nandi·grama, and hurriedly alighting from the chariot he told his gurus: “My brother himself gave me the kingship, as a trust—it is these gold-trimmed slippers that will guarantee its welfare and security—and I shall guard this trust until Rághava’s return. O that I might soon see the feet of Rama Rághava placed within these slippers, tying them on once again with my own hands. When I am reunited with Rághava, I shall lay my burden down, making over the kingship to my guru and resuming toward him the conduct due a guru. When I have restored this trust to Rághava, these splendid slippers, this kingship and Ayódhya, I shall be cleansed of sin. When Kakútstha is consecrated, when the people are delighted and glad once more, the joy and glory I shall gain will be worth four times the kingship.” 107.15

So glorious Bhárata lamented in his desolation, and in Nandi·grama with his counsellors he commenced his rule in sorrow. Heroic Bhárata wore bark cloth and matted hair—the lord wore the garb of a sage—and lived in Nandi·grama with his army, longing for Rama’s return, cherishing his brother, doing his brother’s bidding and intent on carrying out the promise. Bhárata consecrated the slippers and lived in Nandi·grama, and before he would give any order he first apprised the slippers. 107.20

 rata's departure, he began to observe with a growing dismay an uneasiness among the ascetics. It was the ascetics who had earlier taken refuge with Rama and were pleased with the ashram there on Chitra-kuta whom he now observed to be so uneasy. They regarded Rama suspiciously, their brows knit in a frown, and they whispered softly to each other and held conversation among themselves. And observing their uneasiness Rama began to suspect that he himself might be at fault. Cupping his hands in reverence, he addressed the seer who was chief of their community. "Holy 108.5 one, have you found my conduct changed from before? Is that why this change has come over the ascetics? Have the seers found my younger brother Lákshmana doing something unbecoming him, out of negligence? Has Sita failed to maintain properly the conduct becoming a woman, neglecting, in overscrupulous obedience to me, her obedience to you?"

The seer, a man advanced both in years and in asceticism, was trembling slightly as he replied to the compassionate Rama: "How could Vaidéhi ever err, my son, especially against ascetics, when she is so good-natured and always earnest for what is good? It is in fact on your account that 108.10 the ascetics are in this state—because of the rákshasas. That is why they are disquieted and hold conversation among themselves. One of Rávana's younger brothers—Khara is his name—is nearby. He is the one who uprooted all the ascetics dwelling in Jana-sthana. He is an eater of men, audacious and impudent, vicious, haughty and evil, and he cannot abide you, my son. From the moment you came to live in this ashram, my son, the rākshasas have been molesting the ascetics. They show themselves in every form of deformation, loathsome, savage and terrifying forms, a horror to behold. Enemies of all that is noble, they defile some ascetics with unspeakable impurities and strike terror into others by suddenly appearing before them. 108.15

Stealthily they prowl the ashram sites, one after another, and take a mad delight in harassing the ascetics. They scatter the ladles and the other sacrificial implements; they douse the fires with water and break the vessels when the oblations are under way. The ashrams are infested with these wicked creatures. The seers are eager to abandon them and have been urging me to go to some other region. So before these foul creatures offer physical violence to the ascetics, we will leave this ashram, Rama. Not far from here is a wonderful forest with many roots and fruit. It was our old ashram, and I will return there with my host. Before Khara does some harm to you, too, my son, you should come away from here with us, if you are of a mind to do so. For you to live here with your wife is perilous, Rāghava, ever alert and powerful though you may be. It will soon bring you sorrow.” 108.20

So the ascetic spoke, and his uneasiness was such that nothing Prince Rama offered in reply could hold him back. The chief of the community blessed Rāghava, comforted him and asked his leave, and abandoning the ashram with his community he went away. Rama escorted the host of seers, following them out to some distance, and did obeisance to the seer, their chief. They were well pleased and, as they gave him leave, they repeated their advice. Then he returned to his own holy abode to take up his residence. 108.25

Lordly Rághava did not for an instant leave the ashram now that the seers had quit it, the ascetics who had always attended Rághava with the many virtues acquired from their sage conduct.

WHEN THE ASCETICS had departed, Rághava fell to thinking, and he found that for many reasons his dwelling place no longer pleased him. "It was here I saw Bhárata, my mothers, and the townsmen," he reflected, "and my memory lingers on them still in their constant grief. Then, too, the camps great Bhárata pitched and the dung of his elephants and horses have left things in a terrible state. We shall therefore go somewhere else." And so Rághava set forth with Vaidéhi and Lákshmana. 109.1

Making his way to the ashram of Atri, glorious Rama prostrated himself before the holy seer, and Atri received him like a son. He himself provided Rama with hospitality, lavish and honorable, and he cheered Saumítri and illustrious Sita. His aged and honored wife arrived, and the seer, wise in the ways of righteousness and earnest for the welfare of all creatures, invited her and cheered her, too. This was Anasúya, an illustrious ascetic who followed the way of righteousness, and the best of seers bade her receive Vaidéhi. And he told Rama about his ascetic wife who followed the way of righteousness: "Once when the world was utterly ravaged by drought for ten years, it was Anasúya who created roots and fruit and caused the Jáhnavi to flow, for the ascetic power she has acquired is awesome, and mortifications adorn her. She has practiced intense asceticism for ten thousand years, my son, and by her vows all obstacles have 109.5

been removed. It was she who, to advance the cause of the gods, straightway reduced ten nights to one. Here she is, blameless prince; look on her as a mother. Now have Vaidéhi approach her; she is a glorious woman worthy of every creature's adoration, an aged and ever amiable woman."

When the seer had finished speaking, Rághava replied with a word of assent and then addressed Sita, who was wise in the ways of righteousness: "Princess, you have heard 109.15 what the sage has said. Approach the ascetic woman at once, for your own good. Her name is Anasúya, and her deeds have won her renown throughout the world. Approach the ascetic at once—she is most approachable." Sita, princess of Mithila, who always had Rághava's welfare at heart, listened to his words and then sought out Atri's wife, a woman wise in the ways of righteousness. Anasúya was very old, her skin was wrinkled and loose, her hair white with age, and her body trembled constantly, like a plantain tree in the wind. Sita carefully did obeisance to the illustrious and faithful woman and announced her name to her. After doing 109.20 obeisance to the faultless ascetic, Vaidéhi cupped her hands in reverence and delightedly asked after her health.

She, too, felt delight when she saw how illustrious Sita was following the way of righteousness, and she cheered her, exclaiming, "How fortunate you have such high regard for righteousness! How fortunate you should abandon your kinfolk, your pride and wealth, proud Sita, to follow Rama when he was banished to the forest. A woman who holds her husband dear—whether he is in the city or the forest, whether he is good or evil—gains worlds that bring great blessings. To a woman of noble nature her husband is the supreme deity, however bad his character, however licentious or indigent he might be. I can see no kinsman to surpass him, Vaidéhi, far as I might look. Like ascetic power, which once acquired is never lost, a husband is ready and able, come what may. But bad women have no such understanding of virtue and vice. Their hearts are the slaves of desire, and they lord it over their husbands. Indeed, women like that, Máithili, who yield to what they should not do, are held up to infamy and fall away from righteousness. But women like you, virtuous women who can tell good from bad in this world, come to reside in heaven just the same as men who have gained great merit.” 109.25

SO ANASÚYA SPOKE, and Vaidéhi ungrudgingly paid her homage and softly replied: “The instruction my noble lady has given me comes as no surprise. I myself am well aware that a husband is a woman’s guru. Even if my husband were utterly lacking in good behavior, my noble lady, still I would always obey him wholeheartedly. How much more readily would I obey a man praised for his virtues, a compassionate, self-disciplined and righteous man, who is constant in his love, who defers to his mother and holds his father dear? Great Rama behaves toward all the women of the king exactly as he does toward Kausálya. And any woman the king glanced at but once mighty Rama would treat just like a mother, without the least resentment. For he cherishes the king and knows the meaning of righteousness.” 110.1 110.5

The instructions my mother-in-law imparted to me as I was coming to this desolate and frightening forest have remained firmly implanted in my heart. And I have retained as well the lessons my mother taught me long ago, when I gave my hand before the marriage fire. But your words, follower of righteousness, have reminded me afresh of all this: no other ascetic act is required of a woman than obedience to her husband. Sāvitrī is exalted in heaven because she showed obedience to her husband. Arúndhati, too, went up to the heavens by virtue of her obedience to her husband. And Róhini, the very best of women and a goddess up in the heavens, is never seen an instant separated from the moon. Excellent women such as these, firm in their vows to their husbands, are exalted in the world of the gods by reason of their meritorious deeds.” 110.10

Anasúya was delighted to hear Sita’s words. She kissed her on the forehead, and to Sita’s delight she said:

“I possess great ascetic power, acquired through various austerities. I will now make use of it, chaste Sita, for your enjoyment. Your words are fitting and proper, Máithili, and they have pleased me. What is the most suitable thing I might do for you? Only tell me.” “You have already done it,” Sita replied to the woman of ascetic power. These words pleased the righteous woman all the more. “Come now, Sita, I wish to repay the delight you have given me. Here is a choice heavenly garland, raiment and jewelry, and a cream, Vaidéhi, a precious salve. This that I give you, Sita, will beautify your body, it will suit you perfectly, never spoil, and be yours forever. With this heavenly cream applied to 110.15 your body, daughter of Jánaka, you will adorn your husband to the same degree that Shri adorns the eternal Vishnu."

Máithili accepted the raiment, cream, jewelry and garlands, a gift of love without compare. After accepting the gift, glorious Sita cupped her hands in reverence and waited in steadfast attendance upon the ascetic. Now, as Sita was waiting on her, the pious Anasúya put a question to her about a certain tale she was fond of. "It was at a self-choice rite, they say, that glorious Rághava obtained you, Sita. This at least is the tale that has reached my ears. I should like to hear that tale in full, Máithili, exactly as it happened, in its entirety. Would you tell it to me, please?" So the righteous woman spoke, and replying, "You shall hear it then," Sita told the tale: 110.20 110.25

"There is a righteous and mighty king of Míthila; his name is Jánaka. He honors the code of kshátriya and rules his land with prudence. It was once when, plow in hand, he was tilling the circle of fields that I broke through the earth—so the story goes—and arose to become the daughter of the king. King Jánaka was busy sowing grain by the fistful when he caught sight of me, my body all caked with dirt, and he was amazed. He was childless then, you see, and with his own two hands he took me affectionately on his lap. 'She shall be my daughter,' he said, and he showered me with affection. From out of the sky, they say, there came a voice—a human voice but unlike any ever heard: 'It is so, lord of men. By rights the child is yours.' My father, the righteous lord of Míthila, was delighted. The lord of men had obtained vast wealth, he felt, in obtaining me. 110.30

The virtuous king entrusted me to the care of his favorite queen, the eldest, and she raised me affectionately, with a mother's love. Now, when my father observed that I had reached the right age for marriage, he began to worry, and he grew desolate, like a man impoverished by the loss of his wealth. The father of an unmarried girl, though he be the equal of Indra on earth, finds himself humiliated by people, by his equals, and even his inferiors. When the king perceived how close he was coming to humiliation, he was launched upon a sea of worry, and like a man without a raft he could not make the shore. Seeing I was not born of a woman's womb, the protector of the land, for all his thinking, could not discover a fit and proper husband for me. 110.35

But after giving it much thought he had an idea. 'I will hold the self-choice rite for my daughter,' the wise king decided.

He had at that time a superb bow and pair of quivers with inexhaustible arrows. Great Váruna had graciously bestowed them on him at a great sacrifice. Because of its weight humans could not budge the bow, no matter how hard they tried; lords of men were unable to bend it even in their dreams. So after he had extended invitations to the kings and put the bow on display, my truthful father made this declaration before the convocation of the lords of men: 110.40
'The man who can raise this bow and string it shall have my daughter for his wife. Let no one doubt it!' The kings looked at the superior bow, like a mountain in weight, and they said farewell and departed, unable even to lift it. A long time passed until one day this splendid Rághava arrived with

Vishva-mitra to observe a sacrifice. My father paid special homage to valiant Rama and his brother Lákshmana, and to righteous Vishva-mitra. 'Here are two Rághavas,' the sage told my father, 'Rama and Lákshmana, sons of Dasha-ratha. They are eager to see the bow.' Upon hearing this, my father had the bow brought out. 110.45

In the twinkling of an eye mighty Rama bent it, and all at once the mighty prince strung and drew it. And so impetuously did he draw the bow that it broke in two right in the middle, and the sound it made as it fell was dreadful, like a thunderclap. Thereupon my father, true to his agreement, raised up a splendid water vessel, ready to bestow me on Rama. But ready though my father was to bestow me, Rághava would not accept me right away, for he did not yet know the will of his father, the lordly king of Ayódhya. So my father invited my father-in-law, aged King Dasha-ratha, and afterward bestowed me on the celebrated Rama. And my younger sister, the good and lovely Úrmila, my father of his own accord bestowed as wife on Lákshmana. And that is how I was bestowed on Rama, there at the self-choice ceremony, and as is right I love my husband, the mightiest of men." 110.50

WHEN RIGHTEOUS ANASÚYA had heard this extraordinary tale, she embraced Máithili with both arms and kissed her on the forehead. "How wonderfully and sweetly you spoke, each word, each syllable was clear, and now I have heard the whole story of how the self-choice rite took place. I am truly charmed by your tale, my sweet-voiced child. But now the majestic sun is setting, bringing on the gracious 111.1

night. You can hear the twitter of the birds that by day range far and wide in search of food; now at twilight they are going to their roosts to sleep. And here, carrying their water pots, are the sages returning in a group, wet from their ablutions, their bark-cloth garments soaked with water. The seers have made their fire offerings according to precept—do you see the smoke, pearly as a dove's neck, carried by the wind? Though their leaves are really sparse, the trees all about, even in the distance, seem to have grown dense; the horizons are all lost to view. III.5

The creatures that wander by night are now beginning to move, and the deer of the ascetics' grove are settling down on the paths that lead to the altars. Night is coming, Sita, adorned with stars. You can see the moon in his mantle of light rising in the sky. You may go now and attend on Rama, I give you leave. Your sweet storytelling has brought me deep contentment. But first, would you adorn yourself, Máithili, in my presence? Allow me to have the pleasure of seeing you, my child, beautified by these heavenly ornaments." So Sita adorned herself, and looking like the daughter of the gods, she bowed her head to her and went off to Rama. III.10

The eloquent Rághava took great delight in seeing Sita adorned with the ascetic's gift of love. And Sita, princess of Mithila, explained everything to Rama, how the ascetic had given her a gift of love—raiment, jewelry and garlands. Rama was delighted, and so was Lákshmana, the great chariot-warrior, to see the honor conferred on Máithili, an honor such as few mortals ever receive. And so, with the warm reception accorded him by the perfected ascetics, the moon-faced delight of the Raghus happily passed the holy night. III.15

And when night was over, and the forest ascetics had bathed and made their fire offerings, the tigers among men asked leave of them. The forest ascetics, who followed the way of righteousness, informed them that travel through the forest was impeded by rákshasas. "But there is one path through the forest," they said, "which the great seers use when they go to gather fruit. By this path, Rághava, one can pass safely through the otherwise impassable forest."
